This debate has been of great value, because it has demonstrated that we are listening to public sentiment. We have put many things into this bill which we would not have put into it two years ago. My opinion is, it will be no more effective than the Elkins law, and not much more effective than the present interstate-commerce law; and, if it is not, then I believe the people themselves will take charge of this whole subject and own the railroads of the country.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I have voted for two propositions recognizing the right of Congress to some extent, at least, to control the deliberations of the courts upon these questions. I listened to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], who says that this amendment is very important. I presume it is. But, Mr. President, it is not more important than the amendment which the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] offered, and not nearly as simple; and it is, in my judgment, much more likely to get us into difficulty than that was, if we anticipate any difficulty from that.

I think it is the duty of every man, whenever he thinks a pending measure is unconstitutional, to vote against it. If I had believed that the amendment of the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] was unconstitutional, I certainly should not have voted for it, for if the first amendment was unconstitutional, in my judgment as a lawyer the second was; and if I had believed the first was unconstitutional I should not be able to vote for the amendment of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] has submitted an amendment. If I believed that the Constitution of the United States prohibited me from voting for the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], I should not be able to vote for that amendment either. That amendment is a recognition of our right to control the courts. We have a law which now exists—though the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] thinks it does not have anything to do with this case—to which I wish to call attention, which is the act of February 11, 1903. If Senators will examine this bill, they will find on page 17 that it proposes to incorporate that act for all purposes into this bill, not verbatim, but it declares that it is to be in all respects applicable to all the cases brought under this proposed act. It will therefore become as much a part of this proposed act as if it had been incorporated word for word into the bill. That act reads:

> That in any suit in equity pending or hereafter brought in any circuit court of the United States under the act entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," approved July 2, 1890, "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, or any other acts having a like purpose that hereafter may be enacted, wherein the United States is complainant, the Attorney-General may file with the clerk of such court a certificate that, in his opinion, the case is of general public importance, a copy of which shall be immediately furnished by such clerk to each of the circuit judges of the circuit in which the case is pending.

That undoubtedly does give jurisdiction in a case brought under this act to a court consisting of three judges. It is a special court established for this very purpose by this act, and by this act, putting the two together.

I voted for the amendment offered by the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. I voted for it notwithstanding it contained a provision which I did not like. I voted for it because I wanted to emphasize the fact that I believe the power exists here to prevent an interlocutory judgment. I wanted to emphasize my belief that not only have we the power, but that this bill will not be effective and will be of practically no value to the people of the United States unless there is a provision put into it limiting the right of a judge to issue an injunction whenever he sees fit, or two or three judges, if there happen to be two or three judges, to do so.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] has just presented the case. Everybody who has had anything to do with this question and who has had any observation about what has been going on knows just what the difficulty is. There is no question but that in nine cases out of ten when a carrier finds fault with an order of the Commission and complains to a judge, he will find a judge who will issue a temporary injunction for him, or an interlocutory injunction, more properly speaking, which will tie up the case from that time on until the expiration of the period fixed in this bill, which the majority of the Senate persistently declare shall not exceed two years.

Mr. President, there is not a lawyer in this country who does not know that when a railroad goes into the United States circuit courts or when they go into the State courts, they employ, as a rule, the best talent in the profession. They can prevent a judgment for the time that you have fixed here that these orders shall be enforced, for you have determined that that time shall be two years and have voted down three years; and, I presume, two years will be what will be finally provided for in the bill.

Mr. President, I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, and then I shall wonder, I shall look around with surprise, when I see Senators, who are lawyers, who have voted against the preceding amendments—I shall wonder, Mr. President, how they will reconcile their vote then with their votes before, unless they shall put it on the ground that perhaps the first measure was too drastic, and this is modified, or perhaps they will find solace to their consciences in the fact that the court is to consist of two judges, though ordinarily there is but one. But under either of the motions which have been voted down there would have been the same number of judges and the same care and attention given to the question whether an injunction should be issued or not under this provision.

Mr. President, I have but little care as to what happens to this bill. I have been anxious for the passage of a bill which I believe would accomplish what the people of the United States have demanded. I do not believe—and I will put myself on record now—that this bill will do what the Chief Executive asks you to do. I do not believe it will do what 90 per cent of the American people want you to do, or what they believe it will do. I am restrained here by the proprieties of the occasion from saying some things which I should say in some other place; but I do not believe that the friends of this kind of legislation are giving direction here to this bill.

The bill will pass, Mr. President; it will become a law; the people of the United States will be handed a "gold brick," in the common language of the country, and after two or three years of effort to get redress under this bill they will find that they have got to try it over again. It is possible that the people will patiently submit to what they will believe is either the incompetency of this body or its dishonesty—one or the other—but I do not believe, patient and enduring as the public generally are, that they will always submit and allow these great corporations to control not only the transportation of the country, but, because they control the transportation of the country, control also its politics. The day will come when this Senate and the House of Representatives will be compelled to pass a bill that will give to the people the relief which every man here professes to believe they are entitled to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON].

Mr. BACON. On that I ask for the years and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SPOONER (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK]. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 24, nays 52, as follows:

YEAS—24.

Bacon	Culberson	La Follette	Newlands
Berry	Daniel	Latimer	Overman
Blackburn	Dubois	McCreary	Rayner
Clark, Mont.	Foster	McLaurin	Simmons
Clarke, Ark.	Frazier	Martin	Stone
Clay	Gearin	Money	Taliaferro

NAYS—52.

Aldrich	Clark, Wyo.	Gamble	Nelson

NOT VOTING—13.

Bailey	Gorman	Patterson	Tillman
Burton	Heyburn	Proctor
Carmack	McEnery	Spooner
Depew	Mallory	Teller

So Mr. BACON's amendment was rejected.

Mr. ALLISON. I move——

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. TILLMAN. Does the Senator from Iowa desire to move an amendment to the same section?

Mr. ALLISON. I should be glad before leaving this section——

Mr. TILLMAN. I desire to make a slight verbal change in line 11, page 11, which, I think, will clarify the language and be advisable. Mr. President, on page 11, line 11, I move to strike out the words "shall publish and file" and insert the words "in respect to;" then, in line 12——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina.

The SECRETARY. In section 4, page 11, line 11, after the word "otherwise," it is proposed to strike out the words "shall publish and file" and insert the words "in respect to."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALDRICH. I should like to ask what is the other amendment the Senator intends to propose?

Mr. TILLMAN. It is on the next line, to strike out the word "and" and insert the word "shall," so as to complete the sentence and make it run properly.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the portion of the bill proposed to be amended be read as it will appear when amended.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. As proposed to be amended, it would read as follows:

Whenever the carrier or carriers, in obedience to such order of the Commission or otherwise, in respect to joint rates, fares, or charges, shall fail to agree among themselves upon the apportionment or division thereof, the Commission may after hearing make a supplemental order prescribing the portion of such joint rate to be received by each carrier party thereto, which order shall take effect as a part of the original order.

Mr. TILLMAN. This amendment is to correspond to the preceding changes in regard to the publication of joint rates.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the second amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator from Iowa will permit me, before we leave this section I want to move to strike out the words at the bottom of page 11, lines 24 and 25, "provided no reasonable or satisfactory through route exists," and insert in lieu thereof the words "such authority shall extend to through routes and joint rates for transportation partly by railroad and partly by water."

Mr. ALDRICH. That amendment is not a verbal change; it changes the whole sense.

Mr. TILLMAN. I know it is not a verbal amendment. It changes the sense, and I will give the reason for it if the Senator wishes me to do so.

Mr. ALDRICH. That amendment will give rise to a good deal of discussion, because it changes the whole provision in regard to through routes in the House bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. ALLISON. I yield; certainly. I have only one suggestion further to make with reference to this section.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am perfectly willing that the Senator should get through with his amendment to this section, and then let me put my amendment in, or try to put it in.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to move an amendment to correct an omission that I intended to correct before leaving the matter. I ask unanimous consent, in the amendment which was agreed to, on page 11, line 5, to come in after the word "prescribe," to insert after the word "time," where it first occurs, the words "not less than thirty days."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent to amend the amendment heretofore agreed to on his motion. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Secretary will state the proposed amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the amendment agreed to, after the word "prescribe," page 11, line 5, by inserting after the word "time," where it first occurs, the words "not less than thirty days."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TILLMAN. At the bottom of page 11, lines 24 and 25, I move to strike out the words "provided no reasonable or satisfactory through route exists" and insert in lieu thereof "such authority shall extend to through routes and joint rates for transportation partly by railroad and partly by water."

Mr. NELSON. That amendment was agreed to yesterday.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator is mistaken. We did not get to this part of the bill yesterday. There was a preceding amendment that had reference to water, but this is an entirely different matter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina.

The SECRETARY. On page 11, lines 24 and 25, it is proposed to strike out "provided no reasonable or satisfactory through route exists" and insert in lieu thereof the words "such authority shall extend to through routes and joint rates for transportation partly by railroad and partly by water."

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. ALDRICH. I will wait until the Senator gets through.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am going to explain why these words ought to go in.

This is part of a provision covered by lines 17 to 25, page 11, which authorizes the Commission to establish through routes and joint rates as a maximum to be charged, and to prescribe the divisions of such rates when the carriers fail to agree. The defect in this provision is found in the addition, in lines 24 and 25, of the words "provided no reasonable or satisfactory through route exists." This operates as a bar to the compulsory establishment of an additional through route which may be demanded and found reasonable. Such additional through routes very frequently, if not generally, ought to be granted, for otherwise competition between practicable reasonable through routes is denied. As the provision now stands, a through route may be established where none exists, but, generally speaking, there is always at least one through route. The most frequent subject of complaint is discrimination between connecting lines, and however unjust such discrimination against the nonfavored carrier or the public interest may be, the proviso clause above mentioned operates to prevent relief—

I am reading from a memorandum furnished me by the Interstate Commerce Commission—

The Commission has very recently decided the case of the Enterprise Transportation Company against certain trunk lines, and the decision shows a through route between the railroad trunk lines at New York and the Fall River Line to New England, but a refusal to establish a through route with the Enterprise Transportation Company, a water line competing with the Fall River Line between New York and New England. To avoid all question there should be inserted in place of the words stricken out, as above indicated, the following: "Such authority shall extend to through routes and joint rates for transportation partly by railroad and partly by water."

Which are the words I have moved to insert.

Here is the case of this Enterprise Company, in which it is shown that an independent boat line is denied through routes with the western railroads because the New York, New Haven and Hartford road owns the only boat line which reaches Fall River except this one. Therefore competition between the West and New England, for instance, is prevented by the failure to establish through routes, if they are demanded, with other lines. In other words, there is a monopoly created, or is already in existence, and an absolute denial of competition. One boat line connects with the road. The other boat line is not allowed to connect with the road, and is not given through rates.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, there should be no misapprehension as to the effect of this amendment. Under the bill as it passed the House, the Interstate Commerce Commission had a right to establish through routes and joint rates where no reasonable through route exists. This proposes to strike out the provision about reasonableness, and to allow the Commission to establish through routes anywhere in the United States without reference to existing routes and without reference to whether the people are accommodated by the existing route. The question of through routes by rail and water is a different question, and under the guise of providing for through routes by rail and water the Interstate Commerce Commission is suggesting to the Senate or dictating to the Senate that it shall destroy the whole structure of this bill, so far as through routes are concerned.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. ALDRICH. I will yield to the Senator a little later.

Mr. TILLMAN. Unless the Senator has the floor, I can not speak any more.

Mr. ALDRICH. I yield for a question.

Mr. TILLMAN. I should like to ask the Senator if he favors a condition of monopoly by which an existing through route shall maintain and control all the traffic, and deny other boat lines an opportunity to secure some of the traffic by having through routes established by the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. ALDRICH. I am entirely familiar with the case suggested by the Interstate Commerce Commission through the Senator from South Carolina. There is no monopoly and there can be no monopoly of transportation between New York and Providence and Fall River and the other points along the Sound. The Fall River Line, or, rather, the New England Navigation Company, which is a branch of the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad, owns and operates three or four lines of steamers running to New London, Providence, Fall River, and Newport. Well, Newport is part of one line. There are now in existence at least two independent lines covering the same territory, and there is nothing to prevent anyone who cares to go into the business from to-morrow establishing a line or any number of lines over that territory. There can be no monopoly about it, and there is no monopoly.

We are asked to legislate for the whole country upon this one case which the Interstate Commerce Commission has had before it. I have no objection to inserting, after the words now in the bill, the words "in relation to through routes by rail and water;" but I do object to striking out the words "provided no reasonable or satisfactory through routes exist," so as to give the Commission the power to establish through routes anywhere it pleases throughout the United States, without reference to the facilities which now exist.

Mr. TILLMAN. I should like unanimous consent, if the Senate will permit, to insert in the RECORD the hearing and finding, No. 867, of the Interstate Commerce Commission in relation to this matter, without regard to how the vote may be.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the request is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

No. 867. In the matter of alleged unlawful discrimination against the Enterprise Transportation Company by railroad lines leading from New York City.

Railroad lines leading west from New York City make joint through rates with the New England Navigation Company, controlling the Fall River line of steamers, which plies between New York and Fall River, Mass., and some other New England cities, and also controlling other important steamer lines operating on Long Island Sound. Such joint rates apply in both directions between western and New England points. The New England Navigation Company is owned and operated by the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad Company. The rail lines centering in New York and running westerly thereof refuse, for stated business reasons, to make the like or any joint rating arrangement with the Enterprise Transportation Company, a steamship line plying between Fall River and other New England points and New York City, and in competition with the New England Navigation Company's Fall River line. This Fall River line may, by reducing rates on local traffic, force out of business the Enterprise Transportation Company, while obtaining a lucrative and supporting business from through traffic, and upon disappearance of such competition, restore the former charges. The existence of the Enterprise Transportation Company as a competitive factor is of distinct value to the public, and that existence may depend upon its right to engage in through business. This investigation was made with the understanding that the Commission is without power to grant any relief, and no opinion as to whether the through-rating arrangement should be extended to the Enterprise Company is expressed; but if the public is to have the legitimate benefit of water competition, it is evident that authority should be provided to establish through routes between rail and water carriers, or at least to prevent unjust discrimination by rail carriers between connecting water lines.

REPORT AND OPINION OF THE COMMISSION.

PROUTY, Commissioner:

The Enterprise Steamship Company, which plies between Fall River, Mass., and New York City, recently filed an informal complaint with the Commission, alleging that it desired to engage in the transportation of merchandise from Fall River to various western destinations; that in the course of such transportation it would carry the freight to New York and send it west from New York by rail; but that the rail lines leading from New York declined to extend to it the same rates which they applied to traffic of the same character from the same point when delivered to them by its rival—the New England Navigation Company. It appeared from an inspection of our tariffs that these various rail lines published in connection with the New England Navigation Company through rates from Fall River to western destinations, and it seemed, therefore, that the complaint of the Enterprise Company was really that such rail lines declined to enter into through arrangements with it while doing so with its competitor. We accordingly advised the Enterprise Company that the act to regulate commerce did not require rail carriers to form through routes with water lines, and that, therefore, the Commission could make no order in the premises even if the complaint were sustained; but inasmuch as the subject is one of great practical importance, and since the amendment of the act to regulate commerce was now under discussion, it seemed suitable to investigate the circumstances surrounding this complaint with a view to making some report for the general information of the public. A proceeding of inquiry was, therefore, instituted and the various parties were heard. From the testimony taken upon that hearing, in connection with various matters of common knowledge, and the rates on file with this Commission, the following facts appear:

The New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad Company has a practical monopoly of transportation by rail in that territory lying south of the Boston and Albany Railroad and east of its own line from South Norwalk to Pittsfield. The New Haven Company has lines which extend outside this territory, but within this territory it controls all the steam railroads of any consequence, excepting the New London Northern, which extends north from New London, Conn., to Brattleboro, Vt.

Many of the most important towns served by the New Haven Railroad are located upon the ocean, so that water transportation is readily available to many points. The most important of these cities are Providence and Fall River, but lines of steamers touch at almost all cities of any importance upon Long Island Sound by which communication is had with New York City. It was necessary, therefore, for the New Haven Company, in perfecting its transportation monopoly of the territory covered by it, to control also the facilities of transportation by water, especially between those towns and New York City, and in the execution of its plans it either established or acquired most of the important steamship lines operating upon Long Island Sound. These different lines seem to have been consolidated into the New England Navigation Company, which is owned and operated by the New Haven Company, and which has in recent years handled most although by no means all of the water transportation between these various points and New York City.

The Enterprise Steamship Company is incorporated under the laws of Massachusetts and began business in June, 1905. It has a capital stock of $400,000 which, it was stated, has been paid in. Its fleet consists of three steamers, one of 800 tons burden and two of 1,800 tons, the three being fitted for the transportation of both passengers and freight. Its steamers ply exclusively between Fall River and New York City, touching, however, Jamestown, which is opposite Newport, R. I.

For some time past the regular passenger fare between New York City and Fall River has been $3 during the summer and $2 during the winter months. The Enterprise Company established at the outset a rate of $1, which it has ever since maintained. Its representative stated that in his judgment this rate was fairly compensatory for the service and that his company was satisfied to do business on that basis. The New Haven Company has reduced its passenger rate to $1.50 at the present time between New York and Fall River. The testimony did not show what the effect of this reduction was between New York and interior points, nor whether the Enterprise Company carried passengers for such interior points.

The principal traffic from Fall River to New York is cotton piece goods of various kinds, and for many years the rate applied by the New England Navigation Company to this traffic has been 12½ cents per 100 pounds. The Enterprise Company established a rate of 10 cents per 100 pounds at the outset, which has been since continued. The bulk of the transportation by water from New York to Fall River is raw cotton and various mill supplies, and the Enterprise Company fixed its class rates and its local rate on raw cotton at 2 cents per 100 pounds less than that previously prevailing by the New England Navigation Company. It appeared from the testimony that these rates had been continued by the Enterprise Company, and that the New England Company had not reduced its tariffs up to the time of the hearing. It further appeared that under this adjustment of rates the Enterprise Company obtained a considerable part of the strictly local business between Fall River and New York. The general manager of that company testified that of ninety-two mills in Fall River his company was then doing business with eighty-five.

Freight from New England can reach the Middle West by various routes. It may go by the direct all-rail route or by the more circuitous rail route through Canada. It may also be transported by water from New England to some southern port, like Norfolk or Baltimore, and from there taken by rail to its destination. In the latter case the water line frequently pays and absorbs a local rail rate from the interior New England point to the seaboard. These competitive conditions have given New England the same class rates and to a considerable extent the same commodity rates as apply from New York City.

Confining our attention to traffic originating at Fall River, it is evident that this may either be delivered to the New Haven Company for shipment by its rail line or to some steamboat company for transportation by water. Since a comparatively small part of the freight traffic from Fall River stops at New York as a final destination, and since a comparatively small part of that traffic to Fall River originates at New York as the point of original production, it follows that the Enterprise Steamboat Company, if it obtains any great amount of business between these points, must make arrangements with the rail and water carriers leading from New York as to the handling of this business beyond that point. It seems to have been able to do this with water lines leading from New York south, and the testimony indicates that it exchanges at New York City considerable quantities of freight with the Old Dominion Steamship Company. The quickest service between Fall River and the West is by boat from Fall River to New York and by rail from New York. Large amounts of traffic move by this route, which in the past has been exclusively handled by the New England Navigation Company. The Enterprise Company, desiring to participate in this business and also in business moving in the opposite direction, has applied to the various rail lines asking for the same treatment which they accord to the steamboat company of the New Haven road.

The rate from Fall River to Chicago on cotton piece goods is 55 cents, and from New York City the same. When this traffic is brought by boat from Fall River to New York and delivered to the rail carrier at New York there are two services—the transportation from Fall River to New York and the transfer at New York. The transfer charge is ordinarily reckoned at 3 cents per 100 pounds. The local transportation charge of the New Haven Company is 12½ cents, but it was said by witnesses for the Enterprise Company that the trunk lines allowed the New Haven road 10 cents as its division. The transfer service is actually performed, sometimes by the New England Navigation Company and sometimes by the receiving railroad company, but in either case it is paid for by that company; that is to say, the railroad company which receives the cotton piece goods from New England Navigation Company at New York in effect transports that traffic to Chicago for 42 cents, whereas if those goods were delivered to the same company at the same place and under the same circumstances by the Enterprise Company the railway company would exact for its charge 55 cents per 100 pounds. This, of course, deprives the Enterprise Company of all possible opportunity of participating in that business.

The carriers gave various reasons for their refusal to join with the Enterprise Company in these through rates. The Pennsylvania states that its facilities are so congested in New York at the present time that it is only with great difficulty that it can handle the traffic now offered at that point; that if it received this traffic from two companies instead of one, whether it took the traffic itself or whether the traffic was delivered to it, more room would be required. The representative of that company further stated, in substance, that there was only so much traffic from Fall River of this character; that his company could not hope to receive any more business if it joined with the Enterprise Company, since what it received from that company would be subtracted from that amount which it was now receiving from the New England Company, and that, since it could handle the traffic better from one company than from two, he had declined to entertain the proposition.

The New York Central stated that this business was not desirable; that it had no arrangement with any steamboat line except the New England Navigation Company, and that with that company its arrangement only covered the four higher classes. It further stated that it would rather cancel its present arrangements with the New England Navigation Company than extend them to the Enterprise Company. It appeared, in the case of the New York Central, that the traffic was delivered to it by team in New York City, where it was loaded into its cars. No reason was suggested why that company would suffer any inconvenience if it handled traffic for the Enterprise Company delivered to it in the same place and in the same manner.

The other companies, so far as they were represented by witnesses at the hearing, did not claim that they were unable to handle the traffic. Their statements were to the general effect that they preferred to receive this traffic from the New Haven Company by rail; that they only consented to handle it by water through New York as an accommodation to the New England Navigation Company and their patrons, and that they did not desire to form this connection with the Enterprise Company, because they did not desire to increase the amount of this business which came from Fall River by water.

The general situation seems to be this. The New Haven Company controls the greater portion of the traffic within its territory. Most of this traffic, in the natural course of things, would go by the all-rail routes; a certain amount of it may go by water to New York and from there by rail. The lines leading from New York can receive this traffic from the New Haven Company either by rail or by water; they prefer to receive it by rail. At the present time the New Haven road is dividing this business between all these different lines in a satisfactory manner. By forming a connection with the Enterprise Company they would not increase the total amount of the traffic which they handle, and they might introduce a factor which would become a disturbing element in the present harmonious relations. They have nothing to gain, and possibly might lose something by the change.

The Enterprise Company claimed that the refusal of the rail lines to participate with it in through business was the result of an agreement between those lines dictated by the New Haven Company. The only evidence tending to show this directly was the declaration of an agent of the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railroad. The Enterprise Company, desiring to ship cotton piece goods from Fall River to Chadwick, N. Y., and understanding that the above railroad company accorded to the New England Navigation Company a rate from New York of 16⅔ cents, while its local rate was 25½ cents, applied for the same reduced rate. This the agent refused, stating that his company could only accord that rate to the New England Navigation Company by reason of an agreement to that effect with the New Haven Company. We could hardly find from the testimony that any similar agreement with other lines exists, although such may be the fact; and still less that there is any conspiracy among all these railroads to accomplish the thing complained of. It appears to us that the course of these railway lines may be justifiable upon sound business principles if the matter be examined solely from their standpoint.

How does the matter stand when examined from the view point of the public? We have already seen that the Enterprise Company has been of great benefit to shippers and passengers using that line by reducing the rates formerly in effect. The complainant concedes that rates from Fall River to points in the West would not be reduced if the Enterprise Company were accorded the through privileges which it desires. Those rates are for the most part the same from New York and Fall River to Chicago and points basing on Chicago, or which take a percentage of the Chicago rate. To reduce the rate from Fall River would break down the whole scheme of rates. This does not appear to be true of rates to points east of Buffalo and Pittsburg, which are generally less from New York than from Fall River. In very many cases, at least, the rate from Fall River to those points would be less if the present local rate of the Enterprise Company were added to the present division of the rail line from New York. It does not appear whether a reduction would in fact result.

It was also said by the Enterprise Company that if that company could engage in this traffic its patrons would have two lines and would thereby secure more efficient service than otherwise. There was no testimony before us as to the character of the service by either of those steamship lines. It did appear that the Enterprise Company touches at certain wharves in Fall River, to which some of the mills are peculiarly accessible, and that these mills find it to their advantage, for this reason, to patronize that company rather than the New England Company, and that it serves one town not directly served by its rival. It is also undoubtedly true that better and more efficient service is obtained when competition exists than when the business is entirely transacted by one concern.

The most serious feature of this case rests in the fact that if the New England Navigation Company can exclude the Enterprise Company from all participation in through business and confine it strictly to local business between Fall River and New York it thereby acquires the power of forcing the Enterprise Company out of business altogether, for it may so reduce its rates on local traffic that this company could not meet them while obtaining a lucrative and supporting business from through traffic. When the competition of the Enterprise Company had disappeared rates would be restored to what they formerly were, which, it fairly appears, was higher than reasonable competition would produce. The existence of the Enterprise Company as a competitive factor is of distinct value to the public, and that existence may depend upon its right to engage in through business. This is well illustrated by the last case in which this matter has been before the courts: Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Miami S. S. Co. (30 C. C. A., 142; 52 U. S. App., 732; 86 Fed., 407).

Traffic from the Atlantic seaboard to various points in Texas, Indian and Oklahoma Territories and the Mississippi and Missouri valleys passes largely by water from some port like New York to Galveston or New Orleans and is from thence carried by rail to destination. Prior to July, 1897, there was only one steamship line operating between New York and Galveston, known as the "Mallory Line," and two between New York and New Orleans. Three different lines of railway with various connections led from Galveston into Texas and this other territory.

In the summer of 1897 the Miami Steamship Company, conceiving this field to be a promising one, determined to enter it, and put on a line of steamboats between New York and Galveston. At the outset the various railroads leading from the port of Galveston seem to have accorded to the Miami company the same rates and privileges in substance which were given the Mallory Line. The Miami company, however, found it to its advantage to somewhat reduce the rates between New York and Galveston, and this operated to effect a reduction in rates throughout the territory above described, the shrinkage being in all cases in the ocean transportation from New York to Galveston. This created more or less dissatisfaction, since these ocean and rail rates from New York are fixed with reference to the all-rail rates from the same points to the same destinations, and in the early part of 1898 the railroad lines leading from Galveston, the Mallory Line and the two steamship lines leading from New York to New Orleans entered into an arrangement by which it was, among other things, agreed that the railroad lines should break off all connection with the Miami Steamship Company.

Traffic between interior points and the Atlantic seaboard was handled by the various steamship lines in connection with the rail lines upon through bills of lading in both directions, and the through rate was divided between the water and the rail lines upon a basis which allowed to the rail line less than its local tariff from Galveston to point of destination. The railroad companies then declined to honor through bills of lading, and also declined to form through routes upon the basis of the divisions hitherto in force. The Miami Steamship Company could of course transport the freight from New York to Galveston and there tender it to the railroad companies for transportation to destination, but the railroad companies exacted in all cases their local tariff, and required the Miami company to prepay the freight charges. In case of traffic going in the opposite direction, the railroad companies declined to issue any through bill of lading, and required the shipper to prepay the transportation charge to Galveston, if the traffic was to go by the Miami company.

It will be seen at a glance that under these conditions the Miami company could not hope to participate in that traffic; for not only did it receive much less for the same service than its competitors, but the handling of the business by that line was so hedged about with difficulties as to make it almost impossible for the shipper to patronize its route. In view of this that company applied to the Interstate Commerce Commission, but was advised that under the law that body could probably render it no assistance. It thereupon filed a bill in equity in the circuit court for the eastern district of Texas alleging in effect that these different companies were not only in violation of the act to regulate commerce, but were also in violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act and praying an injunction. The circuit court granted the injunction, but the circuit court of appeals in an elaborate opinion dissolved the injunction and held that the Miami company was entitled to no relief; that the railway companies might require the prepayment of their freight charges; that they were not compelled to enter into joint arrangements with one steamship company because they did with another, and that even if the antitrust act were violated only the United States Government could maintain an injunction suit.

The result of this decision was that the Miami Steamship Company withdrew from that field and that rates were restored to their former basis. The further result was that still later many of these rates were advanced, as appeared in testimony before the Commission, by the concerted action of the water lines and various railways and that in consequence rates to Texas common points were also advanced.

This investigation was begun upon the understanding that the Commission had no power to grant any relief in the premises. The railroads have not been heard further than they were inquired of, to some extent, by the Commission itself. We do not think that under these circumstances we ought to express an opinion as to whether these rail lines should accord the Enterprise Company the through arrangements asked for, since it is evident that many things which might influence a final judgment were not developed in the hearing before us.

At the present time water competition exercises an important influence upon the rail rates of this country. That form of competition is less susceptible of control than transportation by rail, and many persons believe that the true policy of this country is found in the improvement and construction of waterways. If the legitimate benefit of such competition is to be had, it is evident that some regulating body must exercise in our country, as does the English railway commission in England, the authority to establish through routes between water and rail carriers, or at least to prevent undue discrimination by rail carriers between connecting water lines.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, this matter has been brought to my attention particularly by the Fall River case, which has been cited by the Senator from South Carolina. An independent steamship company has been started, running from Fall River to New York, and the only other line is the New England Navigation Company, which is controlled by the New York, New Haven and Hartford. The trunk lines, both in New York and New England, so arrange the rates that this steamship company is deprived absolutely of freight, which seems not quite fair to the public or to the company. They brought the case before the Interstate Commerce Commission, which decided, as I remember, that, under the existing law, they had no power to deal with this case.

This bill provides:

That the provisions of this act shall apply to any common carrier or carriers engaged in the transportation of passengers or property wholly by railroad, or partly by railroad and partly by water, when both are used under a common control, management, or arrangement for a continuous carriage or shipment.

In other words, the intent of the bill is clearly to give relief in cases of through rates where there is complaint. But as the bill stands now, on page 11, unless some special provision is made, it covers the land lines, but the water lines connecting are omitted. My desire is simply that the connecting water lines shall be treated, as the first section of the bill obviously intends, in the same way as a through route which is all rail, although made up perhaps of different and connecting companies. There seems to be no reason why, because one of the links in the route is a water line, it should be deprived of the appeal which the bill obviously contemplates. The words which I propose myself to insert are these:

And this provision shall apply when one of the connecting carriers is a water line.

So as to clearly include them.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have no objection to that.

Mr. KNOX. I should like to ask a question of the Senator from Massachusetts before he takes his seat. Do you not think that all of the powers conferred by this bill apply to all the transportation lines referred to in the first section? That would be my notion of it. Here is a power to establish through routes and joint rates. Now, establish through routes and joint rates upon what lines of transportation? Upon all the lines of transportation described in the first section of the bill, because the first section of the bill says they shall be subject to the powers given to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. LODGE. Then, Mr. President, I should not think it would do any harm to insert that provision. What I want is to bring a case like this within the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. KNOX. I have not the slightest objection to inserting it, except that it seems to me this bill has so many things in it in duplicate——

Mr. LODGE. I am inclined to think the interpretation of the Senator from Pennsylvania is correct. If it is the correct interpretation, then it would seem to me that the proviso would absolutely cut off any attempt at competition if a route already existed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. ALDRICH. I hope the Senator from South Carolina will modify the amendment.

Mr. PETTUS. I ask that the pending amendment may be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. At the request of the Senator from Alabama the pending amendment will again be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 11, line 24, after the word "rates," strike out the following words: "provided no reasonable or satisfactory through route exists," and insert in lieu thereof:

Such authority shall extend to through routes and joint rates for transportation partly by railroad and partly by water.

Mr. ALDRICH. I appeal to the Senator from South Carolina to allow the last part of the amendment to be adopted in addition to the words now in the bill.

Mr. TILLMAN. Why should we authorize the Commission to establish through routes and then deny them the privilege here?

Mr. ALDRICH. We do not deny it.

Mr. TILLMAN. We surely do, if we retain the words "if no reasonable or satisfactory through route exists." It looks to me that if those words are stricken out it is left to the discretion of the Commission whether upon a proper complaint there should be another through route established; whereas if there is already one, while the words "reasonable and satisfactory" might, in the judgment of the Commission, warrant them in establishing another, because the one is not reasonable and satisfactory, the idea I would have would be that the Commission would hesitate very long about establishing another route if one was already in existence, because the determination whether it was reasonable and satisfactory would be left to them and they might not want to assume the responsibility. On the other hand, if this clause is not in, then the Commission would determine that question under its general power.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair would call attention to the fact that both Senators are out of order under the rule.

Mr. LODGE. I was aware of that. I was just about to begin by saying that, speaking in violation of the rule, I should like to say a word to the Senator from South Carolina about the proviso, "provided no reasonable or satisfactory through route exists."

The very proposition on which this appeal rests, as I understand, is that the service of the through route in existence is neither reasonable nor satisfactory. My doubt arises from the fact that it does not seem to me to include water lines. The Senator from Pennsylvania may be right about that. But I do not think it could do any harm to insert:

And this provision shall apply when one of the connecting carriers is a water line.

Mr. TILLMAN. If that is satisfactory to the Senator, it is satisfactory to me, because it is in his part of the world and not mine.

Mr. LODGE. I think it would meet the difficulty.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina——

Mr. TILLMAN. I accept the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

Mr. LODGE. Add at the end of line 25—

And this provision shall apply when one of the connecting carriers is a water line.

Mr. FULTON. Does that leave in the proviso?

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes.

Mr. FULTON. I submit that the proviso ought to go out. It serves no good purpose there, and it will be a feature of embarrassment.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will suggest that the Secretary first state the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina as amended by the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts. Does the Chair understand the Senator from South Carolina to have withdrawn his proposed amendment?

Mr. TILLMAN. I am entirely indifferent in this matter in a personal way other than that I am trying to get the best possible law. It seems to me the amendment proposed by the Interstate Commerce Commission is a perfectly just and proper one. I do not know in whose time I am speaking, unless it is by the indulgence of the Senate; the fact that I am in charge of the bill and am trying to get the bill——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the debate has been proceeding for some time in violation of the rule, but by unanimous consent.

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not want to break a rule which I am so anxious to have maintained. I would rather leave it to the Senate and let the Senate determine it. I will not withdraw the amendment.

Mr. TELLER. Let us have it read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from South Carolina has not withdrawn his amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair so understands, and it will be stated by the Secretary.

Mr. TELLER. I understand he accepted an amendment to it.

Mr. TILLMAN. No; I have just changed my mind.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 11, line 24, after the word "rates," strike out the following words: "provided no reasonable or satisfactory through route exists," and insert in lieu thereof:

Such authority shall extend to through routes and joint rates for transportation partly by railroad and partly by water.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment just stated.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SPOONER obtained the floor.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to offer my amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts will be stated.

Mr. SPOONER. I supposed I was recognized by the Chair.

Mr. LODGE. I suppose the Senator can cut me off if he wants to.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not want to cut you off.

Mr. LODGE. I do not want to take the floor. I merely desire to offer my amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin was recognized. Does he yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Massachusetts again state his amendment?

Mr. LODGE. My amendment is to add the words which I have stated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will again be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "exists," in line 25, on page 11, it is proposed to insert:

And this provision shall apply when one of the connecting carriers is a water line.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPOONER. I want to call the attention of the Senator from South Carolina to the fourteenth line, page 11. I think he will very much perfect the language and possibly eliminate some invalidity from it if he will insert there the words "just and reasonable," so that it will read "just and reasonable portion of the rate." I move to insert, after the word "the," in line 14, the words "just and reasonable."

The SECRETARY. On page 11, line 14, before the word "portion," it is proposed to insert "just and reasonable;" so that if amended it will read:

The Commission may after hearing make a supplemental order prescribing the just and reasonable portion.

Mr. SPOONER. I move to insert "proportion" instead of "portion."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 11, line 5, after the word "prescribed," it is proposed to insert the following:

The Commission in prescribing any maximum rate or charge as herein provided shall not be authorized to receive complaints or determine differentials or preference of one locality over another.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, there has been so much discussion of this bill that I have no disposition to be heard or to hear my voice in this debate. I have an article from a recent issue of the Washington Post which discusses this matter so clearly and, to my mind, so convincing that I am going to ask the Secretary to read it instead of discussing it myself. I think he can read it in the time that is allotted to me—fifteen minutes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary proceeded to read the article.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the article may be inserted in the RECORD without further reading.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. FORAKER. I should like to hear it read. If I understand the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire, it is one in which I am very much interested, as is the locality where I reside.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the Secretary read.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the article.

Mr. FORAKER. I withdraw the request I made a moment ago that the reading of the article be continued. I see what the amendment is. I hope it will be voted down, and I hope it will be voted down for the reason that it raises a question in which Cincinnati is very importantly interested. We have had trouble there for many years on account of the very thing that this would prohibit not being done by anybody, and it has been the hope of the people residing there and interested in shipping and common carriers that in this legislation we might secure relief from what we believe to be a discrimination against Cincinnati in the fixing of rates from other cities to points in southern territory in which Cincinnati competes with these other cities for a market. I do not want to prolong the argument. I discussed this at length on another occasion. I think Senators all understand it. I think it would be very unfortunate for us if in addition to not giving us affirmative relief we should provide affirmatively, as the adoption of the amendment would, that we should not have any relief under this law.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. What disposition does the Senator from New Hampshire desire made of the article?

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the remainder of the article be inserted in the RECORD without reading, and let a vote be taken on the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article referred to is as follows:

When the Senate takes up consideration of the amendments to the Hepburn railroad rate bill, there will doubtless be considerable discussion of the question as to the basis on which the Interstate Commerce Commission shall make rates. The bill in its present form does not undertake to prescribe any basis or standard for the guidance of the Commission, but proposes to leave that body free to exercise its judgment as to every rate. Whether the bill, as finally amended, prescribes any definite basis for rate making or not, however, it is probably inevitable that the Commission must adopt a basis or standard of some kind, and adhere to it very closely in all of its orders changing rates. Otherwise it is sure to be charged with making rates by favor and to be criticised for alleged discriminations in favor of certain shippers or certain localities.

The only basis of rate making that has thus far been suggested by any Senator is that of flat mileage rates. It is apparent that if the Commission should make rates on this basis it could defend itself against charges of favoritism, for the rate between any two points on any given commodity would then be the product of the mileage rate multiplied by the number of miles. This would be easy, but would it be satisfactory? For, on the other hand, it is apparent that no system of rate making would be so disastrous to many localities in the United States as would be one based on mileage. It is apparently universally believed by Senators and others who have given this matter close attention that the putting into effect of such a system would mean the remaking of the commercial and industrial map of the United States.

IN EUROPEAN COUNTRIES.

It is stated by an expert upon this subject that in all of the European countries, in which the railroads are either owned and operated by the government or the rates are fixed by governmental authority, and in which rates based on distance are adhered to more or less closely, the uniform effect has been unmistakably to greatly restrict the amount of railway traffic and to narrow the range of commercial activities. In most of the continental countries the railroads have been and are regarded as part of the political machinery and as means for making effective governmental commercial policies. With this end in view, there have been departures from distance rates on export and import traffic and on transit traffic originating in one country and carried across another to a third country or to a seaport; but the domestic traffic in each country is moved on rates adhering very closely to a fixed charge per unit of weight for each unit of distance. While the effect of this has been obviously injurious, it has not been so disastrous in most European countries as it would be in the United States, for the reason that in all of those countries except Russia distances are comparatively short, and in many of them, such as France, Germany, and Holland, inland water transportation has been very highly developed. Whereas in the United States the tendency is constantly toward the abandonment of canal and river traffic, as a result of the low rates made by railroads for long hauls; in both France and Germany the inland waterways are constantly drawing more and more traffic from the railroads, and in both countries the facilities for water transportation are being increased so as to accommodate the low-grade and long-distance traffic that can not pay the high-distance charges by rail.

EFFECT IN GERMANY.

In Germany the effect of distance rates has been to separate the Empire into producing and distributing centers, and the spectacle is presented, for instance, of one section of Germany exporting grains to foreign countries and receiving a governmental bounty on these exports, while another section is importing grain subject to an import duty. The situation is much the same as would exist in this country if rates on grain from the Mississippi Valley to the Atlantic seaboard were so high that grain from the Northwest would move by water to New Orleans for export, while New York and Boston would have to import grain and flour from Canada.

In Russia distances more nearly approximate those in the United States, and the result of distance rates in that country has been to favor the development of localities convenient to the seaports at the expense of interior communities. For instance, much of the land along the line of the Trans-Siberian Railway is well adapted to the growing of wheat, but the freight rates from the Siberian wheat fields to the ports of the Baltic and the Black seas are so high as to be almost prohibitory, with the result that the development of the country along the Trans-Siberian Railway has been greatly retarded and is in marked contrast with the phenomenal development of the territory tributary to the Canadian Pacific, where conditions are somewhat similar, but where freight rates have been made on the American system of disregarding distance when necessary to bring a producing locality into communication with a market.

AUSTRALIA AS AN EXAMPLE.

In no country has the effect of mileage rates been more clearly demonstrated than in Australia. There distances are as great as in the United States, but transportation conditions are entirely different, due to a close adherence to mileage rates and to failure to adopt the American system of port differentials and the American system of basic or basing points. The effect has been to concentrate population and manufacturing, and the business of distributing both domestic and imported commodities almost exclusively in one large seaport city in each colony. In the entire eastern half of Australia the conditions are admirable for the building up of large numbers of flourishing cities and towns, each serving as a base of distribution for the surrounding agricultural communities and each affording a convenient market for part of the farm and garden products of those communities. But, in all this immense tract of country there are no interior towns or cities of importance. The urban population, instead of being distributed among a large number of places of moderate size, such as abound in the United States, is, as is above mentioned, congested in one large seaport town for each colony.

WORKING OF AMERICAN SYSTEM.

In the United States, where the railroads, up to this time, have been free to adjust their rates to commercial conditions, it has been found expedient and economical to so adjust rates as to build up distributing and manufacturing points in all parts of the country, with the result that there has been a decentralization of population and of industry that has enormously benefited every section. There has been a disposition on the part of some critics of the American railway system to criticise the basing-point system, by which rates from manufacturing centers and seaports to stations within a more or less restricted area about the basing point are fixed by adding to the rate to the basing point the local rates to these surrounding stations. Some of these smaller points have looked upon the lower rates to the basing points as unjustly discriminatory, but a study of the transportation problems involved will show that there is no injustice to the smaller towns in this system. One of the great advantages of the basing-point system is that it admits of more economical railroad operation, and, consequently, of lower average rates. If all goods were shipped direct to the points of consumption from the manufacturing and seaport cities, the number of small consignments would be very largely increased. There would be few shipments in carload lots. Through freight trains would have to stop at more stations to drop a single car or to unload part of a car, and the cost of the service would be increased accordingly. The business of the wholesaler at the basing point would be destroyed, but the retailer at the smaller town would not benefit, for, instead of buying his supplies in the neighboring city, he would have to buy it at some city at a much greater distance, probably at New York, and his freight bills, instead of being smaller, would undoubtedly be larger. This would not be his only loss, but the producers of his locality would lose the advantage of a neighboring city market for part of their products, and the imposition of mileage rates to distant markets would still further reduce their purchasing power. The tendency of mileage rates would be to injure the business of every basing-point city throughout the South and West, and all through the interior of the country, and to build up the seaports, notably New York, and the manufacturing cities nearest to the supplies of raw material.

RESULT THAT WOULD BE INEVITABLE.

For these reasons it is hardly to be expected that Congress will ever deliberately enact a law requiring railroad rates in the United States to be made on a mileage basis; but some students of the question contend that governmental rates must necessarily approximate that basis, and that when the Commission is given the rate-making power many of the results that would follow the legislative establishments of mileage rates will be inevitable. It is contended that the decisions of the Commission in the past show that this would be the result. In the cases in which the Commission has attempted to make rates or has condemned existing rates, its findings have been based very largely upon considerations of distance. A notable illustration of this was afforded by the New York milk-rate decision, the tendency of which was to concentrate milk production for the New York market in localities nearest to the city, and many other cases might be cited showing the same tendency.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Let the amendment be stated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. At the request of the Senator from Indiana, the amendment will again be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 11, line 5, after the word "prescribed," it is proposed to insert the following:

The Commission in prescribing any maximum rate or charge, as herein provided, shall not be authorized to receive complaints or determine differentials or preferences of one locality over another.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, it is rather astonishing to me, after some Senators have taken two or three days to discuss portions of this bill, that an article which would have occupied only ten or twelve minutes in reading, which is the best argument I have ever seen on the subject now before the Senate, should be objected to. But I am willing to let it go in the RECORD without reading, and to let a vote be taken.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President, the pending amendment as it now reads seems to me so inartificially drawn that it is absolutely fatal to the bill. If an amendment of this sort is to be offered, it ought to be drawn with a great deal of care. This amendment provides for all cases of preferentials and differentials of one locality as against another; it includes localities on the same line; and it absolutely deprives the Commission of any right to determine every question of discrimination on the same line. If the Senator from New Hampshire had worded it so as to apply to different lines or different roads furnishing competing localities, it might possibly do, although I think the provisions in the bill cover it. But this covers an inland point and a terminal point on the same line, and if there is any preference given to the terminal point over the inland point, or the inland point over the terminal point, it takes from the Commission the right to determine that. I should like to have the amendment read again, because it is a matter of vast importance, and I think is fatal to the bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. I appeal to the Senator from New Hampshire to withdraw the amendment until we can get through with the amendment pending to this section and the next section.

Mr. GALLINGER. I know of no reason why I should withdraw it. Let the Senate dispose of it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again read the amendment, at the request of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER].

The SECRETARY. On page 11, line 5, after the word "prescribed," it is proposed to insert the following:

The Commission in prescribing any maximum rate or charge, as herein provided, shall not be authorized to receive complaints or determine differentials or preferences of one locality over another.

Mr. RAYNER. According to the amendment, they could not entertain any complaint between localities on the same line.

Mr. NELSON. I do not want to interrupt the Senator——

Mr. RAYNER. I will submit to an interruption in a minute. I did not know that an amendment of this sort would come up, but having been informed by the Senator from New Hampshire, and having observed the amendment which he introduced at an earlier stage of the session, I want to say a few words upon the subject, because I think it is one of the most important subjects before us, and I think the amendment is fatal to the bill.

I desire to emphasize what I have heretofore said at the opening of this debate upon the subject of differentials. This is a most important inquiry, and if this bill gave the right to the Commission to adjust differentials between competitive localities I doubt very much whether the bill would pass. This power would be so unlimited that I am not certain that we would be willing to confer it upon the Commission. It would virtually take the ports of entry of this country out of the hands of the railroads, who are building them up, and place them in the hands of the Commission, to destroy their business and throttle their trade and enterprise if they desired to do so, and even if the Commission were absolutely impartial, as I believe it is and will be, it would nevertheless devolve upon it a duty of such a delicate nature and of such tremendous responsibility that I do not think that any tribunal would be equal to its accomplishment.

Let us fall into no error upon this point. If the bill confers any such authority I want to know it, and if by the remotest implication it could be construed as granting it, the people who are interested are entitled to understand it. The committee of the House came to the conclusion that it did not embrace differentials. The House passed it. Relying upon that assumption, the majority of us have, I believe, entertained the same idea. The Interstate Commerce Commission does not believe that it could exercise such a jurisdiction. Every board of trade and chamber of commerce and business organization that I have heard from are all of this opinion, that this measure does not confer such power; but there are several Senators upon this flobr who entertain a different idea, and who have claimed that the right exists under the phraseology of this bill. There is no question connected with this controversy of the practical importance that this is. Let me say that I do not find anything in this bill whatever that gives the Commission any right to adjust differentials. Its provisions are limited to discriminations upon the same roads. The words "unjustly discriminatory" or "unduly preferential" or "prejudicial" apply to rates and regulations and practices upon the same road, because there can be no such thing as an unjust discrimination or an undue preference between different roads supplying different territory and terminating at different points.

On the one hand, the rate or the regulation or the practice of one road can not be changed because the rate or the regulation or the practice of another road is in violation of the law. If one road charges an unreasonable rate or a discriminating rate, that would surely not justify the Commission's adjusting the rate between this road and some other road that has no connection with it by law or privity of contract. On the other hand, it is not possible that if the rate upon one road is just and reasonable that the rate can be lowered because it is higher than the rate upon some other road which is also just and reasonable. The very foundation upon which the bill rests is that the rate or practice must be unjust or unreasonable or unjustly discriminatory, and if the rate or practice is just and reasonable, then the Commission has no right to change it. The complainant must set forth that it is unjust or unreasonable or discriminatory, and if the Commission should undertake to lower a rate which did not violate the law, upon this ground, its acts would be absolutely ultra vires and null and void, and could not be enforced by judicial process.

Now, Mr. President, I propose to proceed a step further upon the proposition of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. In my judgment, if this bill by any implication or intendment could be construed as conferring upon the Commission the power to adjust differentials between competing roads and competitive localities, it would, under its present language, be deficient in any legislative standard by which the Commission could proceed to make that adjustment, and would therefore be held as conferring upon the Commission legislative powers and fall within the argument and objections of the Senator from Ohio that he has directed against the entire measure. There must be a legislative standard. No legislative discretion must be left to the Commission, and if the Commission, in a case where a certain rate was perfectly just and reasonable and not discriminatory, could deliberately change it because it varied from the rate of some other carrier, it would be exercising an unlimited discretion and legislative function which it does not come within our power to invest it with.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. RAYNER. Now, let me finish this paragraph and then I will yield to the Senator.

Now, one other proposition: This bill absolutely excludes the right to adjust differentials because it does not give the right to fix or adjust rates, but the power is given to fix maximum rates. It is not within the range of possibility to adjust a differential by the fixing of a maximum rate. If, for instance, a rate was lowered upon a road between Chicago and New York, and a maximum rate established in order to meet a lower rate upon another competing road between Chicago and Baltimore, the latter road would immediately reduce its rate and keep up the differential. Let me illustrate: If there was a dollar rate between Chicago and New York upon one road and a rate of 95 cents between Chicago and Baltimore upon another road, and the Commission lowered the rate upon the first road to 95 cents, the other road, that was covering the territory between Chicago and Baltimore, would lower its rate to 90 cents, and thus maintain the differential. The Commission could not interfere, because it has no right under this bill to fix a minimum rate between Chicago and Baltimore, and it could not prevent the lowering of the rate between these places in order to meet the lower rate between Chicago and New York. I have therefore come to the conclusion that legally there is no power in this bill to adjust differentials, and practically it would be impossible for the Commission, even through arbitrary and unjustifiable process by induction, to reach this result.

Now I will answer any question I can.

Mr. GALLINGER. I simply wanted to suggest to the Senator that among other Senators I consulted on this question was the Senator from Maryland, and he promised me to give me the benefit of his learning and experience on this matter. Not hearing from the Senator, I have submitted the amendment, which is not entirely mine; other persons were consulted about it. I believe it is a good amendment, and that if put in the bill it will save a great deal of harm that may come from the bill without it. But under the circumstances, Mr. President, I will ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment that I may confer with Senators further, and it is possible we may agree upon some amendment that can be put in the bill.

Mr. RAYNER. Before the amendment is withdrawn I want to call the Senator's attention to this difficulty, and when I conferred with him it was a difficulty that struck me as very great in reference to this amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. I remember the Senator's observation.

Mr. RAYNER. The amendment reads:

The Commission in prescribing any maximum rate or charge as herein provided shall not be authorized to receive complaints or determine differentials or preferences of one locality over another.

The trouble about that amendment is that it covers localities of the same road, and that is exactly what the Commission is to do. The Commission has power to receive complaints and to determine differentials upon the same road. It is to determine this very thing of one locality over another upon the same route. When you eliminate that from the provisions of the bill you take away from the Commission every other power it has except this.

Mr. GALLINGER. The reason I do that, if the Senator will permit me, is because I have a great deal more confidence in ability of the railroads to fix proper rates regarding differentials of this kind than I have in the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. RAYNER. In my judgment, it is entirely a question of discrimination. The question of just or unreasonable rates is not a question that concerns us so much, because one witness after another has testified that there are few unjust or unreasonable rates. The principal question is a question of discrimination between localities upon the same road, and here you deprive the Commission of the right of determining the very question, and the only one of the practical questions, perhaps, that it will be called upon to determine in its entire transactions.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, what is the pending question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER.]

Mr. GALLINGER. I withdraw it temporarily.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire withdraws his amendment temporarily. Are there further amendments to section 4?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk to be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 12, after line 11, insert:

The Commission shall determine, from investigation and hearing appropriate to the inquiry, the proportions of the entire traffic of any carrier whose rate or rates has been challenged in the manner provided in this act which pertain to interstate and intrastate traffic, respectively, and when said relative proportions of said traffic are so ascertained the Commission shall consider, in fixing a just and reasonable rate under the provisions of this act, the revenue derived from intrastate traffic as part of the gross income of said carrier and make due allowance therefor in establishing the basis for prescribing said just and reasonable rate.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, the object of the amendment is to provide means of curing what seems to me to be an obvious defect in this matter of making rates, when we consider the fact that there are two kinds of traffic to be dealt with and the problems connected with its transportation solved.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Smythe v. Ames (169 U. S.), has declared that the State of Nebraska, in fixing rates, can take no notice of the fact that the carrier is also engaged in interstate traffic. The contention was made in that that the rate prescribed by the Nebraska commission was an entirely proper one when notice was taken of the fact that a considerable part of the carrier's income was derived from interstate traffic, and that having reference to the entire volume of its business, the rate was not an unreasonable one.

The Supreme Court, in dealing with this contention advanced by counsel for State commission, said:

It is further said, in behalf of the appellants, that the reasonableness of the rates established by the Nebraska statute is not to be determined by the inquiry whether such rates would leave a reasonable net profit from the local business affected thereby, but that the court should take into consideration, among other things, the whole business of the company—that is, all its business, passenger and freight, interstate and domestic. If it be found upon investigation that the profits derived by a railroad company from its interstate business alone are sufficient to cover operating expenses on its entire line, and also to meet interest, and justify a liberal dividend upon its stock, may the legislature prescribe rates for domestic business that would bring no reward and be less than the services rendered are reasonably worth? Or must the rates for such transportation as begins and ends in the State be established with reference solely to the amount of business done by the carrier wholly within such State, to the cost of doing such local business, and to the fair value of the property used in conducting it, without taking into consideration the amount and cost of its interstate business, and the value of the property employed in it? If we do not misapprehend counsel, their argument leads to the conclusion that the State of Nebraska could legally require local freight business to be conducted even at an actual loss, if the company earned on its interstate business enough to give it just compensation in respect of its entire line and all its business, interstate and domestic. We can not concur in this view. In our judgment, it must be held that the reasonableness or unreasonableness of rates prescribed by a State for the transportation of persons and property wholly within its limits must be determined without reference to the interstate business done by the carrier, or to the profits derived from it. The State can not justify unreasonably low rates for domestic transportation, considered alone, upon the ground that the carrier is earning large profits on its interstate business, over which, so far as rates are concerned, the State has no control. Nor can the carrier justify unreasonably high rates on domestic business upon the ground that it will be able only in that way to meet losses on its interstate business. So far as rates of transportation are concerned, domestic business should not be made to bear the losses on interstate business, nor the latter the losses on domestic business. It is only rates for the transportation of persons and property between points within the State that the State can prescribe; and when it undertakes to prescribe rates not to be exceeded by the carrier, it must do so with reference exclusively to what is just and reasonable, as between the carrier and the public, in respect of domestic business. The argument that a railroad line is an entirety, that its income goes into, and its expenses are provided for, out of a common fund, and that its capitalization is on its entire line, within and without the State, can have no application where the State is without authority over rates on the entire line, and can only deal with local rates and make such regulations as are necessary to give just compensation on local business.

The declarations of that opinion indicate that it is one out of which confusion and uncertainty will inevitably arise when its action in the matter of fixing interstate rates is contested. It has not heretofore presented a practical difficulty in the work of the Interstate Commerce Commission for the reason that the Commission had no power to fix rates, and therefore it had no occasion to encounter the embarrassments growing out of this decision. It is perfectly plain that it will now become a practical question, and that if the doctrine of this opinion is to be applied when the Commission undertakes to fix a rate relating to interstate commerce that no notice can be taken of the fact that the carrier is also engaged in carrying State traffic.

The only purpose of the proposed amendment is to provide a plan by which the Commission can determine in a legal way a fact which everybody knows to exist, and that the carrier is engaged in both kinds of traffic, and that it derives its gross income from both kinds of traffic. It is proposed that there shall be such a comprehensive consideration of the volume of traffic actually carried as may enable the Commission to know what will be the proper basis upon which to allow the carrier a just compensation for carrying interstate traffic. It provides a method by which an obvious defect can be cured.

In the case of Tompkins (reported in 175 U. S.)—a case that came up from South Dakota—the circuit judge undertook to deal with the situation created by the case of Smythe v. Ames. He undertook to establish for himself a way by which he would solve the difficulty. He found, from the evidence introduced in the case pending before him, that $10,000,000 of capital stock of the Northern Pacific Railroad was exerted in carrying on business in that State; that $8,000,000 of that capital was being exerted in carrying on interstate business and $2,000,000 in carrying on State traffic. Taking that for his basis, he undertook to prescribe for the railroad a reasonable rate for State business. His decree was reversed in its entirety by the Supreme Court of the United States on the ground that he had undertaken to make in person, and without the aid of a master, the calculations and computations necessary to a final decree. Because of the practice adopted by the trial court, the Supreme Court held that its decree was not based on findings made with sufficient intelligence to enable the court to say whether he was right or wrong on its real merits. The decree was reversed and the whole matter was sent back, no reference being made in the order of reversal in approval or condemnation of the plan followed.

So we are left in doubt as to what is the proper plane for the trial courts to follow. I think if the Commission is to fix the interstate rate the Commission ought to know, and it ought to have before it in an authoritative form, a finding showing the entire volume of traffic with which it is to deal, the amount of income that the carrier derives from all of it, State and interstate, and the sum that it ought to be allowed to derive from its interstate traffic. There ought to be a legislative method for the solution of this problem, to the end that it may be no longer a source which will invite litigation and lead to confusion.

I believe, therefore, some such provision as this ought to go into the law giving the Commission power to institute inquiry to determine the question as nearly as can be done, so that the several States may incidentally and authoritatively be advised as to the part of the inquiry in which each is interested, which is the volume of business with which it can deal. It will add to the simplicity and reliability of that work, and, I believe, will be a very wholesome addition to the general plan of regulation we are now seeking to establish.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE].

Mr. BAILEY. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. BAILEY. I wish to say a word about the amendment, if it is to be voted down. I had supposed——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will again ask if there is a second to the demand for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BAILEY. I think the amendment is important and I think it ought to be adopted, but I am willing to take a vote on it if the Senate will give me a recorded vote.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there a second to the demand for the yeas and nays on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Let the proposed amendment be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 12, after line 11, insert:

The Commission shall determine, from investigation and hearing appropriate to the inquiry, the proportions of the entire traffic of any carrier whose rate or rates has been challenged in the manner provided in this act which pertain to interstate and intrastate traffic, respectively, and when said relative proportions of said traffic are so ascertained the Commission shall consider, in fixing a just and reasonable rate under the provisions of this act, the revenue derived from intrastate traffic as part of the gross income of said carrier and make due allowance therefor in establishing the basis for prescribing said just and reasonable rate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE].

The Secretary called the roll.

Mr. SPOONER (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK]. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 48, as follows:

YEAS—27.

Allee	Clay	Latimer	Pettus
Bacon	Culberson	McCreary	Rayner
Bailey	Daniel	McLaurin	Simmons
Berry	Dubois	Martin	Taliaferro
Blackburn	Frazier	Money	Teller
Clark, Mont.	Gearin	Newlands	Tillman
Clarke, Ark.	La Follette	Overman

NAYS—48.

NOT VOTING—14.

Burton	Frye	Mallory	Spooner
Carmack	Gorman	Morgan	Stone
Depew	Heyburn	Patterson
Foster	McEnery	Proctor

So the amendment of Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas was rejected.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President, I have concluded to offer the amendment in reference to the broad and narrow review under section 15, instead of under section 16 as I contemplated, and I move to insert it after the word "jurisdiction," in line 9, page 11. I ask the Secretary to read it.

The SECRETARY. On page 11 of the bill, line 9, after the word "jurisdiction," the last word in the line, insert:

But such order shall not be set aside by any court unless it violates the Constitution of the United States or exceeds the jurisdiction conferred upon the Commission.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President, this raises the distinction between what has been called the broad and the narrow review. If I may be permitted to say so, I think both those words are misnomers and that the proper names are "the constitutional" and "the statutory review;" the statutory review, of course, always including the constitutional review.

I am in favor of the constitutional review. The review that the President of the United States has submitted to us is the broadest sort of statutory review; and I think that, in my judgment, as I shall presently try to demonstrate, whatever may be the result of the vote upon this amendment, this distinction ought plainly to get into the RECORD, so that we may all know how to vote upon it, and so that the people may understand the distinction.

I wish very much that the President of the United States—and I say it with great respect and deference—had not interfered in this legislation and had permitted us to settle this case right here in this body, where the responsibility devolves. I do not say, Mr. President, that anyone has set a trap for the President of the United States; I would not make a declaration of that kind upon this floor; but I do say, and I say it again with the greatest respect and deference to the President, that the President, unfortunately, is so constituted that he can not look at a trap without fooling with the spring. [Laughter.] Last week, after he was caught in this trap for a day or so, in some way or other he worked his way out of it, and then he kept on looking at it and walking around it and walking in and out of it until he was caught beyond all hope of escape. Now his party friends and his party enemies are vying with each other as to which one of them can get in first and participate with him in his gratuitous captivity. [Laughter.]

A few weeks ago—four or five or six weeks ago—he sent to us as his envoy extraordinary the Senator from Kansas [Mr. LONG], and he intrusted to him the mission of a constitutional review. Last Friday, without notifying the Senator from Kansas that his credentials had been revoked, he appointed in his place as minister plenipotentiary the distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], with the mission of a broad statutory review. Now, I understand perfectly well that the Senator from Iowa did not seek this appointment. I am informed that he was peacefully reposing in nocturnal innocence when this appointment was made and when these mighty honors and this distinguished servitude were thrust upon him. At any rate, we have two reviews sent here by the President—the one in the hands of the Senator from Kansas and the other in the hands of the Senator from Iowa and both of them in deadly conflict with each other.

I say here, in passing, that both of these ministers are equally well accredited. The certificate of the Senator from Kansas had the impress of the royal authority, and the testimonials of the distinguished Senator from Iowa not only bear the imperial seal, but they are authenticated in a manner that ought to give them absolute authenticity by the coat of arms of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH]. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, we understand what all this means here, but the people do not understand it. We understand that the President is no longer caressing the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] and the Senator from Kansas, but that he has transferred his affections and is now clasping to his bosom, with the fondest and most fervent devotion, the senior Senator from Rhode Island. [Laughter.]

The President tells us that these two reviews which he has sent in here are one and the same thing, but, Mr. President, they are as widely different as it is possible for two divergent propositions to be. The one is the review under the Constitution, which you can not eliminate without invalidating your law; the other is the broad statutory review, which permits the courts to try the cases de novo and in the same manner as if no such body as the Interstate Commerce Commission had ever existed upon the face of the earth.

The one, the review of the Senator from Kansas, confines the court within a given compass—the compass of the Constitution; the other extends to the utmost limits of their jurisdiction. The one leaves the rate-making power with the Commission; the other, as I shall presently show, transfers the whole controversy to the court and renders the Commission absolutely impotent and powerless to accomplish the object and purposes of its creation.

Let us see whether I am right or not. I will guarantee to any probationer or apprentice in his profession, if this review passes and he will take this case into court, I will stand surety and sponsor for him that the courts, without hesitation, will decide that they have a right to try the whole case from its inception to its completion as if no proceeding whatever had taken place under it.

What is this review? The original Hepburn bill gives the venue. Giving the court the venue does not give it jurisdiction. It says the venue——

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator pardon me a moment?

Mr. RAYNER. I will if I can get two or three minutes more. I must press about an hour's thought into fifteen minutes. I do not object to an interruption, if you will not object to my taking two or three minutes beyond the fifteen minutes allowed.

Mr. ALDRICH. I can not make any such arrangement as that.

Mr. RAYNER. Well, then, if the Senate will give me unanimous consent to speak beyond the limit—because this is a very important matter—I will not trespass over five minutes beyond the time. I hope this time is not being counted against me, Mr. President.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

Mr. RAYNER. What does the Senator want to know? Go on and ask me a question, if you wish.

Mr. ALDRICH. The question I was about to ask——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. RAYNER. For a question; yes.

Mr. ALDRICH. I desire to ask the Senator from Maryland whether he has changed his opinion in reference to the difference between just compensation for services rendered and a just and reasonable rate? I asked him when he was addressing the Senate some time ago, whether there was any difference, and he said he thought there was not; but I suppose from his opening remarks that he has changed his opinion, and that he is guilty of what he is accusing the President of. The Senator from Maryland seems certainly to have changed his opinion in the opposite direction.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President, the Senator from Rhode Island evidently does not understand what my opinion was; but we all understand what the President's opinion is, because we have got here both his opinions in conflict with each other.

The question to which the Senator from Rhode Island refers has nothing whatever to do with the proposition I am talking about. I am talking about the distribution of the jurisdiction given to the courts. I have never changed my mind about the proposition I first suggested here in connection with just and reasonable compensation. I was in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Texas, which provided that the court should determine whether or not there had been just compensation, and that that should be the constitutional question which the court should pass upon; but I am now upon an entirely different branch of the subject, which has no connection whatever with the question the Senator is addressing to me.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

Mr. RAYNER. You will have to let me go on.

Mr. ALDRICH. Just one sentence.

Mr. RAYNER. I have no time to lose.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. ALDRICH. Only for a single sentence.

Mr. RAYNER. Very well; but let it be a short sentence.

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes; a very short sentence. The constitutional question is whether just compensation is afforded by rates prescribed. The statutory question is whether just and reasonable rates are fixed; and there is absolutely no distinction whatever between the two.

Mr. RAYNER. That just shows how little the Senator from Rhode Island knows about the legal environment of this entire question. [Laughter.] If there are two propositions on the face of this earth that are separate from each other, it is whether or not the courts shall try the question of just compensation under the Constitution or whether they shall try the question whether the Commission has fixed a reasonable rate, which is an entirely different question from the question whether or not the carrier has received just compensation under the Constitution.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

Mr. RAYNER. Let me proceed a minute, because this is a very important matter, and I really think, Mr. President, that the time ought to be extended five or ten minutes upon it; but if Senators object, I will make half of my speech now, and I will make the other half of it when the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] offers his amendment, because I intend to say what is necessary on this subject. So I will make the first half of my speech now.

Mr. President, this is the distribution of jurisdiction under the Constitution—Article III, section 2.

In distributing that jurisdiction we can give any part of it we want to inferior courts. You can give them the right to try a constitutional question, or you can give them the right to try any other question you wish. In the jurisdiction the President has made he gives them the unlimited and the unqualified right to try the entire question. If you will read over the clause you will find when you put the venue in your court you say the court shall have jurisdiction of every bill that is filed for the purpose of setting aside, annulling, enjoining, or suspending any order, and when you come to put the jurisdiction, you put it in an equal degree and with the same latitude that you give the venue.

Mr. ALDRICH rose.

Mr. RAYNER. I can not now stop for an interruption. I am sorry that I can not do so; but the Senator will appreciate why I can not do so.

I say, therefore, Mr. President, when you give the full venue and full jurisdiction all that the courts will do will be to take up the case and try it over again; there is nothing else for them to do. If anyone is in favor of constitutional jurisdiction in a court, why not say so? Why not provide in this amendment as the President first provided? Just let us look at his first amendment a moment. The President's first amendment:

> The court is to determine whether the order complained of was beyond the authority of the Commission or in violation of rights secured by the Constitution.

That is the first amendment. That is all right, and I am willing to vote for that. If the President had stood his ground and not surrendered so quickly as he did, we could have passed this amendment. This is the constitutional amendment.

The other amendment is under section 2 of Article III of the Constitution. You are distributing jurisdiction and you are giving them unlimited jurisdiction, because you are giving them unlimited venue, and you make your jurisdiction equivalent to your venue. In other words, wherever you give a venue you give jurisdiction, and you give a venue in every case where you go into court to set aside, sustain, enjoin, or annul an order. Therefore you have given the broadest statutory jurisdiction it is possible to give. That is beyond any idea contemplated by any Senator who has been in favor of a broad review. It is an absolute surrender upon this entire subject, and I want to congratulate the Senators who are in favor of this broad review upon having achieved this signal victory, and in congratulating them—and I am not impugning the motives of any one in favor of the broad review—I want to say that the President ought not to have changed his ground as precipitately as he has done; but I want to congratulate them on the signal victory they have gained, and I want to congratulate every railroad president in the United States and all their conquering retinue of counsel upon the great triumph they have attained.

It is an unfortunate thing, Mr. President—deplorable—that just at the very moment when political considerations were being eliminated; when elements in both parties were uniting upon a proposition that was acceptable to the people, and when the prize was within our hands that we had been struggling for for months, that the President, through executive interference upon the most vital point in the bill, should compel his party and compel us to accept a subterfuge and proclaim an unconditional surrender.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. RAYNER. I will finish the balance of my speech when the Senator from Iowa shall offer his amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER].

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, in the limited time I have to discuss this question I shall confine myself to the discussion of these different amendments and shall later refer to the pleasant reference which the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] made to myself as the author of a pending amendment.

Mr. RAYNER. As the author of the pending amendment. Oh, no. The Senator was the author of the old amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. LONG. I said that I was the author of a pending amendment.

Mr. RAYNER. I thought you said that you were the author of the pending amendment.

Mr. LONG. I did not make that statement.

Mr. President, this controversy has been as to the difference between a broad and a limited court review. I agree with the Senator from Maryland that those words do not properly define the difference between the various kinds of court review. In my opinion, this bill as it came to us from the House without any amendment as to the court review or with the amendment which I proposed, or with the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] does not differ in any particular. The extent of judicial interference with rates made by the Commission under the House bill unamended, or under my amendment, or under the amendment of the Senator from Iowa would be the same.

The controversy at the time I presented the amendment was precipitated by the effort made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and other Senators to secure what in fact was a broad review.

The difference between a broad review and a limited review is not that, under the first the court would go into the whole question, and would not do so under the second. No Senator has taken the position that in a suit brought in court to set aside an order of the Commission that the court would not examine all the questions necessary to ascertain whether the order should be suspended. The question is, after completing the examination, Shall the order be set aside?

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] in his speech defined what I understand to be a broad review. It is one that confers upon the court the duty of trying anew the questions that were tried by the Commission and to come to a conclusion upon the facts independent of the conclusion of the Commission. The Commission is authorized to prescribe a just and reasonable rate, and a broad review is one that imposes the duty upon the court on review to ascertain whether in fact the rate is just and reasonable. That has been, as I understand, the contention of Senators who have been endeavoring to put into this bill a broad review amendment.

broad review amendment. Here is what the Senator from Ohio said in his speech as to what he understood to be a broad review:

> Fortunately some of the most important of the questions to which attention has been called can not be withheld from the courts. But the power to review the question as to whether a rate condemned or a rate made by the Commission in a given case is reasonable is, unfortunately, not one of these. The making of a rate is a legislative act, and legislative discretion of the Commission in determining what is a reasonable rate can not be interfered with by the courts in the absence of special statutory authority, unless the rate be fixed so high that it is extortionate to the shipper, or so low that it is confiscatory as to the carrier.

Then, discussing it further, he said:

> But between extortion on the one hand, and confiscation on the other, there is, in most cases, a considerable latitude within which the action of the Commission, without special statutory provision for review of it by the courts, would be final and conclusive.

In my speech of April 3, 1906, the following colloquy occurred between the Senator from Ohio and myself, showing the kind of review he desired:

> Mr. LONG. Possibly the Senator was not in the Chamber when I read from his speech, in which he defined the kind of review he desired in this bill. As I understand the Senator's language, he wishes a review that will give the court the authority to pass upon the reasonableness of a rate which is between one that is so high as to be extortionate to the shipper and so low as to be confiscatory to the carrier. The Senator wants a provision in the bill that would authorize the court to pass upon such a rate and revise the judgment of the Commission.
> Mr. FORAKER. And so I do, Mr. President.
> Mr. LONG. That is what I thought.
> Mr. FORAKER. And not only did I contend for that, but I contended that the court ought to have the power conferred upon it in making this review to determine whether the rate that was condemned as unreasonable was in fact unreasonable, or whether it was a just and reasonable rate that should not have been condemned; and the court should have the power—and it could not have it unless we conferred it upon it—of determining whether or not the rate suggested was between the extremes of confiscatory and extortionate, and, therefore, a reasonable and just rate which the Commission had a right under the command of a statute to prescribe.
> Mr. LONG. I so understood the Senator.
> I think the last statement of the Senator from Ohio makes it very plain as to what he wants. He wants the court given authority by a provision for review to revise a rate that is somewhere between a rate that is so high that it is extortionate to the shipper and a rate that is so low that it is confiscatory to the carrier, both of which will now be set aside without any special statutory authority. He wants a provision for review authorizing the courts to revise and set aside rates between those two extremes.
> Mr. HOPKINS. And a rate that has been set aside also.
> Mr. LONG. And the rate of the carrier that has been set aside by the Commission.

To the same extent are the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who was the first Senator to argue here in favor of a broad review. In his speech he said:

> Finally, there should be ample provision for an appeal to—or, more properly, a review by—courts of competent jurisdiction sitting in equity, not only as to whether the rate is confiscatory, but also whether it is just and reasonable, and an arrangement should be made by law for the rapid disposition of all such cases.

If Congress confers upon the Commission the duty of determining and prescribing a just and reasonable rate and then imposes upon the courts the duty of ascertaining whether the rate fixed by the Commission is in fact just and reasonable, then the whole duty is imposed on the courts on review that is conferred upon the Commission, and, under these circumstances, there is no necessity for a Commission. The whole rate-making power is conferred on the courts on review, which I do not believe they will assume. By examining the different court review amendments that have been offered, we can understand very clearly the difference between an amendment which seeks to impose upon the courts the same duty that is imposed upon the Commission and one that does not. The broadest review provision I know of was that contained in the Esch-Townsend bill, which passed the House last session. This provision was the first suggested to the friends of this measure by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] as an amendment to this bill and rejected by us. Let me call your attention to the provision. After providing for the fixing of the rate by the Commission, it says:

> Any person or persons directly affected by the order of the Commission, and deeming it to be contrary to law, may institute proceedings in the court of transportation, sitting as a court of equity, to have it reviewed, and its lawfulness, justness, or reasonableness inquired into and determined.

Every question submitted to the Interstate Commerce Commission would, under this provision of the Esch-Townsend bill, be submitted to the court of transportation.

Mr. SCOTT. And there were only 11 votes in the House against that bill.

Mr. LONG. But it was abandoned at this session and the Hepburn bill was reported instead.

The Senator from Ohio certainly knows how to draw a broad review amendment, and I wish to call attention to the amendment he offered to this bill. I understand it is similar to the review provision in the Ohio railway law.

Mr. FORAKER. It is an exact copy.

Mr. LONG. It is an exact copy of the provision in those statutes.

Mr. FORAKER. I did not draw it at all.

Mr. LONG. It reads, referring to the suit authorized to be brought against the Commission—> to vacate and set aside any such order on the ground that the rate or rates, fares, charges, classifications, joint rate or rates fixed in such order is unlawful or unreasonable, or that any such regulation, practice, or service fixed in such order is unreasonable.

It further provides that—

> In all actions under this section the burden of proof shall be upon the plaintiff to show by clear and satisfactory evidence that the order of the Commission complained of is unlawful or unreasonable, as the case may be.

The question of the reasonableness and justness of the order can be inquired into by the courts, if they will assume the jurisdiction under the Esch-Townsend bill and under this amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

Now, taking the document that was printed at the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], we find that provisions for review that impose upon the courts the consideration of the same questions that are conferred upon the Commission are found in the following States:

ALABAMA.

> That upon the trial of said cause the order of the railroad commission shall be prima facie evidence that the thing ordered to be done was correct, reasonable, and just, and the burden of showing that such order is not correct, reasonable, and just shall be upon the railroad or railroads failing or refusing to comply with the order of said railroad commission.

KANSAS.

> And said court may set aside, vacate, or annul one or more or any part of any of the regulations, orders, findings, or decisions adopted by the said board which shall be found to be unreasonable, unjust, oppressive, or unlawful without disturbing others.

MINNESOTA.

> Upon such appeal, and upon the hearing of any application by the commission or by the attorney-general, for the enforcement of any such order made by the commission, the district court shall have jurisdiction to, and it shall examine the whole matter in controversy, including matters of fact as well as questions of law, and to affirm modify, or reverse such order in whole or in part, as justice may require.

MISSISSIPPI.

But in trials of cases brought for a violation of any tariff of charges as fixed by the Commission, it may be shown in defense that such tariff so fixed was unreasonable and unjust to the carrier.

TEXAS.

In all trials under the foregoing article, the burden of proof shall rest upon the plaintiff, who must show by clear and satisfactory evidence that the rates, regulation, order, classification, act, or charges complained of, are unreasonable and unjust to it or them.

WASHINGTON.

Any railroad or express company affected by the order of the Commission and deeming it to be contrary to the law, may institute proceedings in the superior court of the State of Washington in the county in which the hearing before the Commission upon the complaint had been held, and have such order reviewed and its reasonableness and lawfulness inquired into and determined.

WISCONSIN.

Any railroad or other party in interest being dissatisfied with any order of the commission fixing any rate or rates, fares, charges, classifications, joint rate or rates, or any order fixing any regulations, practices or service, may commence an action in the circuit court against the commission, as defendant, to vacate and set aside any such order on the ground that the rate or rates, fares, charges, classifications, joint rate or rates, fixed in such order, is unlawful, or that any such regulation, practice or service, fixed in such order, is unreasonable, in which action the complaint shall be served with the summons.

Examples of limited review provisions are found in this bill as it came from the House of Representatives without amendment, or with the amendment which I proposed, or with the amendment which the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] proposed. The following States have limited review provisions:

LOUISIANA.

If any railroad, express, telephone, telegraph, steamboat and other water craft, or sleeping-car company, or other party in interest, be dissatisfied with the decision or fixing of any rate, classification, rules, charge, order, act, or regulation, adopted by the commission, such party may file a petition setting forth the cause or causes of objection to such decision, act, rule, rate, charge, classification, or order, or to either or to all of them, in a court of competent jurisdiction, at the domicile of the commission, against said commission as defendant, and either party to said action may appeal the case to the supreme court of the State, without regard to the amount involved, and all such cases, both in the trial and appellate courts, shall be tried summarily, and by preference over all other cases.

NORTH CAROLINA.

Provided, That any company may appeal to the judge of the superior court in term time and thence to the supreme court from any determination of the commission fixing or refusing to change the rate of freight or fare.

NORTH DAKOTA.

Any railroad, railroad corporation, or common carrier subject to the provisions of this article, or any other person interested in the order made by the commisioners of railroads may appeal to the district court of the proper county in the judicial district of this State from which the complaint arose, and which is the subject and basis of the order, from any order made by the commissioners of railroads regulating or fixing its tariffs or rates, fares, charges, or classifications, or from any other order made by said commissioners under the provisions of this article by serving a notice in writing upon the secretary of said commissioners, or any one of said commissioners, within twenty days after such railroad, railroad corporation, or common carrier shall receive notice from such commissioners of the making and entry of such order.

SOUTH DAKOTA.

Whenever any common carrier, as defined in and subject to the provisions of this article, shall violate or refuse or neglect to obey any lawful order or requirement of the said board or railroad commissioners, it shall be the duty of said commissioners, and lawful for any company or person interested in such order or requirement, to apply in a summary way, by petition to the circuit court in any county of this State in which the common carrier complained of has its principal office, or in any county through which its line of road passes or is operated, or in which the violation or disobedience of such order or requirement may happen, alleging such violation or disobedience as the case may be; and the said court shall have power to hear and determine the matter on such short notice to the common carrier complained of as the court shall deem reasonable, and such notice may be served on such common carrier, it or its officers, agents, or servants in such manner as the court shall direct; and said courts shall proceed to hear and determine the matter speedily as a court of equity and without the formal pleadings and proceedings applicable to ordinary suits in equity, but in such manner as to do justice in the premises.

The amendment of the Senator from Iowa provides that "and jurisdiction to hear and determine such suits is hereby vested in such courts." What words should be added to make it an amendment in which the court would be invited to go into all the questions that were pending before the Commission? I call the attention of the Senator from Maryland to what I think should be added to make the amendment of the Senator from Iowa a broad review. It should read like this:

And jurisdiction to hear and determine in such suits whether the rate fixed by the Commission is in fact just and reasonable, is hereby vested in such courts.

Those are the words which the Senator from Ohio wanted in a review amendment; those are the words which the Senator from Massachusetts wanted to insert; those words are not in this amendment now. Or it could be made broad in this form:

And jurisdiction to hear and determine in such suits the justness and reasonableness of the rate fixed by the Commission, is hereby vested in such courts.

In both of these suggested amendments, if adopted, the attempt would be made to confer the rate-making power on the courts on review.

It will be observed that the difference between a broad and limited court review is that in the broad review the duty is imposed upon the court to ascertain whether the rate fixed by the Commission is in fact just and reasonable. This is the same duty that Congress imposes upon the Commission, and, if after imposing the duty upon the Commission, Congress imposes the same duty upon the court, it is impossible to determine why a Commission is needed.

In the limited review, jurisdiction is conferred upon the court, making it clear that it is not the intention of the legislature to prevent a review of the orders of the Commission by the courts, but no words are used that can be construed to mean that the legislature intended that the court should inquire into the facts and revise the judgment and discretion of the Commission.

Of course, broad review amendments are predicated upon the assumption that the courts would assume the duty of revising the judgment and discretion of the Commission if invited to do so by Congress in this legislation. I do not believe they would do this.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question? I do not want to interrupt him if he objects.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. LONG. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator believe that the bill as it came from the House of Representatives gave to the courts jurisdiction over suits brought to set aside or suspend the orders of the Commission?

Mr. LONG. I do, and I so stated in my remarks on the 3d of April.

Mr. ALDRICH. I remember what the Senator said, and I will say, as the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] has brought my name into this debate, that, in my judgment, the amendment now offered by the Senator from Iowa does not go one single step beyond that; that it simply confers in terms upon the courts jurisdiction which the Senator from Kansas and other Senators who are in favor of this legislation have always contended was accomplished by the House bill.

Mr. RAYNER. May I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. LONG. Yes.

Mr. RAYNER. Will the Senator from Kansas be willing to vote in favor of his own amendment?

Mr. LONG. Certainly. But you have not presented my amendment.

Mr. RAYNER. There is only one word in it different. Take out the word "jurisdiction" and insert the word "authority," and it is your amendment. I will put in the word "authority." Now, will you vote in favor of your own amendment?

Mr. LONG. Offer my amendment, and I will vote for it.

Mr. RAYNER. I will offer it.

Mr. LONG. You can not offer it in my time.

Mr. RAYNER. I ask the Senator to yield to me for a moment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. LONG. Not to offer an amendment now.

Mr. RAYNER. You challenged me to do it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas declines to yield.

Mr. RAYNER. If he does not yield, of course I can not offer the amendment.

Mr. LONG. As I stated before, I consider that the bill as it came from the House, without any amendment, provided for a limited review; that the courts would not try the same questions de novo that were tried by the Commission and pass on the facts without regard to the findings of the Commission. All the review amendments that seek to impose the duty upon the courts that is imposed by this bill upon the Commission are based upon the theory that the courts will assume that jurisdiction. As I stated in the speech I made on the 3d of April, I do not believe the courts, under any review amendment that may be made, would exercise this jurisdiction. My amendment did nothing more than to make clear in words the limitations that the Supreme Court of the United States has prescribed for itself in the consideration and determination of these questions.

The two leading cases in which the Supreme Court has considered rates made under the authority of State legislatures have been the Reagan case (154 U. S., 362) and Smyth v. Ames (169 U. S., 466). The Texas statute gave a broad review to the court in the consideration of orders made by the commission in the following language:

In all trials under the foregoing section the burden of proof shall rest upon the plaintiff, who must show by clear and satisfactory evidence that the rates, regulations, orders, classifications, acts, or charges complained of are unreasonable and unjust to it or them.

But the Supreme Court, in its consideration of the schedule of rates made by an order of the Texas Railway Commission, confined its examination to the question as to whether or not the rates were so unjust and so unreasonable as to take the property of the carrier without just compensation. Justice Brewer for the court said:

The courts are not authorized to revise or change the body of rates imposed by a legislature or a commission; they do not determine whether one rate is preferable to another, or what under all circumstances would be fair and reasonable as between the carriers and the shippers; they do not engage in any mere administrative work; but still there can be no doubt of their power and duty to inquire whether a body of rates prescribed by a legislature or a commission is unjust and unreasonable, and such as to work a practical destruction to rights of property, and if found so to be, to restrain its operation.

It will be observed that the court limited its inquiry into the question as to whether or not the body of rates prescribed by the legislature was so unjust and so unreasonable as to work a practical destruction of the rights of property. In this case Justice Brewer also announced the doctrine that courts will restrain the illegal acts of a special tribunal when it has exceeded its authority, even though the acts were done under a valid law. He said:

Neither will the constitutionality of the statute, if that be conceded, avail to oust the Federal court of jurisdiction. A valid law may be wrongfully administered by officers of the State, and so as to make such administration an illegal burden and exaction upon the individual. A tax law, as it leaves the legislative hands, may not be obnoxious to any challenge, and yet the officers charged with the administration of that valid tax law may so act under it in the matter of assessment or collection as to work an illegal trespass upon the property rights of the individual. They may go beyond the powers thereby conferred, and when they do so the fact that they are assuming to act under a valid law will not oust the courts of jurisdiction to restrain their excessive and illegal acts.

In the case of Smyth v. Ames (169 U. S., 466) the statute of Nebraska gave a broad review in the following language:

Whenever any railroad company or companies in this State shall, in a proper action, show by competent testimony that the schedule of rates prescribed by the act is unjust and unreasonable, such railroad or railroads shall be exempt therefrom as hereinafter provided.

Notwithstanding this statute, the court confined itself in that case to the same questions that were considered in the Reagan case—that is, as to whether the property rights of the carrier secured by the Constitution of the United States had been invaded.

There are three recent cases of the Supreme Court in which the extent of judicial interference with the rates made under legislative authority has been fully considered.

The first is the San Diego Land Company case (174 U. S., 754), a unanimous decision, in which Justice Harlan, speaking for the court, said:

But it should also be remembered that the judiciary ought not to interfere with the collection of rates established under legislative sanction unless they are so plainly and palpably unreasonable as to make their enforcement equivalent to the taking of property for public use without such compensation as under all the circumstances is just both to the owner and to the public—that is, judicial interference should never occur unless the case presents, clearly and beyond all doubt, such a flagrant attack upon the rights of property under the guise of regulations as to compel the court to say that the rates prescribed will necessarily have the effect to deny just compensation for private property taken for the public use.

He further said:

The only issue properly to be determined by a final decree in this cause is whether the ordinance in question, fixing rates for water supplied for use within the city, is to be stricken down as confiscatory by its necessary operation, and therefore in violation of the Constitution of the United States.

The second case is that of the Minnesota Railroad Company v. Minnesota (186 U. S., 257), which was also a unanimous decision, in which Justice Brown, speaking for the court, said:

The presumption is that the rates fixed by the commission are reasonable and the burden of proof is upon the railroad companies to show the contrary.

He further said:

It is sufficient, however, for the purpose of this case to say that the action of the Commission in fixing the rate complained of as to this particular class of freight has not been shown to be so unjust or unreasonable as to amount to a taking of property without due process of law, and we therefore conclude that the judgment of the Supreme Court must be affirmed.

It will be observed that the Supreme Court in this case confined itself to the question as to whether or not the rate complained of was so unjust or unreasonable as to amount to a taking of property without due process of law. The Minnesota statute gave the courts the broadest kind of review, as I have heretofore shown, and yet the Supreme Court of the United States in considering the subject confined itself to the consideration of the constitutional questions involved.

The third case is that of the San Diego Land Company v. Jasper (189 U. S., 439), also a unanimous decision, in which Justice Holmes, speaking for the court, said:

We do not sit as a general appellate board of revision for all rates and taxes in the United States. We stop with considering whether it clearly appears that the Constitution of the United States has been infringed, together with such collateral questions as may be incidental to our jurisdiction over that one.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is obliged to inform the Senator from Kansas that his time has expired.

Mr. LONG. I will avail myself of the liberty of speaking somewhat further on another amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I perhaps should state my acknowledgments in the beginning to the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] who, in a way of pleasantry, undertakes to give me credit which I do not deserve, and also to give the President credit which he does not deserve.

The amendment of the Senator from Maryland, which is under discussion at this time, is practically the amendment which I have offered to this bill, and no amount of declamation and positive and often-reiterated assertion can change the situation of this bill. I want to call the attention of the Senate, first—and I will only occupy a minute—to the framework of this bill. The framework of the bill, if it is to be worth anything, should contain a provision whereby a commission, administrative in its character, shall carry out the legislative will, as found in this bill, if it shall become a law.

The Commission is clothed by this bill with the power of Congress, as I understand, and when it makes a decision and a declaration, it has the force and power of a legislative act, or else we have spent here three months or more in vain. Either the making of a rate is a legislative act or it is nothing, under the Constitution and our system of Government. The judicial power can not be invoked to make a rate, nor can the executive power. Therefore, in acting here we are seeking, within constitutional limits, to devolve upon a commission of seven picked and enlightened men, power to deal with this great and complicated question as related to 250,000 miles of railway.

Does anybody believe that it is possible for the courts of the United States to deal with this question under the Constitution? The jurisdiction of this question does not lie in the amendment which I have offered, nor does it lie in the amendment which the Senator from Maryland has offered. If we are ever to exercise governmental power over the railways it must be done here in this body and in the other Chamber. It can not be done anywhere else. If we have not the power to delegate to a commission the details of this legislation as respects what is a reasonable rate, then it can not be done by any body, and we are relegated in this country of ours, under constitutional limitations, to saying that the railroads of this country, without let or hindrance, may make their own rates without revision.

We must select for the execution of this law seven men who are the fit men of this country, familiar with this great subject, and we must rely upon their intelligence and their integrity to deal with this question, and we must give them, and we propose to give them in this bill, the necessary power to do it. But, of course, they must exercise that power within constitutional limitations. Those constitutional limitations are familiar to us all. They are that the rates fixed by the Commission shall provide a just compensation to the carrier; and that we would have to do if we sat down in this Chamber and fixed a schedule of rates for every railroad in the country. Although we have the legislative power to do that, it is impossible for us to exercise it, and everybody knows it is impossible. Therefore we must, within the powers we have, without trenching absolutely upon the legislative power, grant to the Commission the power to enable them to establish a just and reasonable rate under the conditions of this bill.

What is a just and reasonable rate? I heard the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] himself describe a just and reasonable rate as a just compensation, using the constitutional term. We have been trying to do that for a long time. This is the first time that the question of fixing a rate has ever come up in Congress. No Congress has ever before put in the hands of a commission the power that this bill proposes to give to them.

It has been said frequently, I know, and it has been said on this floor in debate, that in the legislation of 1887 we gave that power to the Commission. I was present here when that whole debate occurred, and I wish to say that it is not possible that the Congress at that time intended to give this power to the Commission. It was discussed more or less frequently, but you may ransack that debate, which continued for six weeks, and you will find that in no case was it proposed to give to the Commission the power of fixing rates, either maximum or minimum or both. The effect of that act was to make the Commission nothing but an arbitration board or referee. They could not even enforce any of their own orders. They were obliged, if one of their orders was disobeyed by a railroad company, to go to the court for the purpose of having it enforced. Although it may be that there was no objection to the power of making rates being given to the Commission for some time after the Commission was organized, it was not in the contemplation of the men who framed that act that there should be power given to the Commission to fix rates of any kind.

Now, for the first time, we are confronted with this specific question. We all agree that we can not here directly make rates or revise rates. Hence we are seeking to establish a commission of the highest character and intelligence, which shall deal with this question as an administrative board. When they have dealt with it, their order stands as the judgment and the will of Congress, or else it is nothing. The basis of this whole transaction, when the Commission has exercised its authority and issued its order, is equivalent to a statute. What do the courts do in case we pass a law here upon this subject and a suit is brought to test that law? The test is its constitutionality and nothing else. It is that, or it is that this administrative board of ours has exceeded its authority. Those are the only two questions which can possibly come up under this bill under any circumstances or any situation whatever.

Why does the Senator from Maryland, in his peculiar and euphonic way, undertake to say that here is an opportunity for the judiciary of the United States to deal with every question that can possibly come up under this bill? Mr. President, it does not require a lawyer of many years standing to know that his construction of this amendment is an impossible construction. I will venture the statement that there is no court in this country which will in the slightest degree give heed to the suggestions the Senator has made. I know there are a great many statutes of the character of this proposed legislation in the States. State after State has given to the courts full and complete review of acts of their commissions, and I want the Senator from Maryland or some other Senator to show me where the Supreme Court has gone one step beyond the discussion of the constitutional power of the Commission or the question whether it had exceeded its authority. Where is the decision that goes beyond that? I have listened to these debates with interest and with great benefit to myself, but I know of no opinion from any judicial body which undertakes to say that every little act of the Commission may be reviewed by the court.

That is the view I take of this amendment of mine; it is called mine on the face of these papers. The Senator from Maryland does me the honor to say that I am merely acting for the Executive as respects this amendment. I will deal with that later when the Senator from Maryland has had another opportunity to be heard. I hope there will be a sufficient number of amendments offered to enable me also to say a few words on that subject.

So I conclude, Mr. President, by saying that the amendment of the Senator from Maryland, this bill as it came to us from the House, and the amendment which I had the honor to offer through my friend the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] a day or two ago are all of them limited as respects the jurisdiction of the courts to two questions—(1) whether or not the Commission has acted beyond its authority, and (2) whether the decision of the Commission fixes a just and reasonable rate and gives just compensation, because I remember how thoroughly the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] elaborated that question about just and reasonable rates and just compensation. He treated them as I treat them now, as synonymous.

The VICE-PRESIDENT rapped with his gavel.

Mr. ALLISON. That is the only question involved in the amendment of the Senator from Maryland.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Iowa has expired.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, it is not entirely creditable to the candor of the Senate to say that for three long months this controversy has been revolving around the question as to the character of a court review, and now, after all of this long debate, it is suddenly discovered that all court reviews at last mean the same thing.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator allow me for a moment?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. I did not say all "court reviews." I said the several propositions that are now pending.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator will find that if he can sustain the proposition that the court review, as it will be defined in the bill with his amendment, is the same as the court review proposed by the Senator from Maryland, then all court reviews at last come to the same complexion. The Senator from Iowa makes this mistake. He assumes that Congress is compelled to confer upon the courts all the jurisdiction which this bill, with his amendment, confers. But, sir, nothing could be further from an accurate statement of the law than that. The only jurisdiction which Congress is compelled to confer upon the courts is the jurisdiction to hear and determine the carrier's constitutional right to a just compensation for his property. Indeed, Congress is not compelled to confer even that in the bill, but if it failed to do so and if it did not exist, independently of this bill, under the existing law, then the bill itself would be unconstitutional and void. The carrier could not affirmatively assail it, because the court can entertain jurisdiction of no suit except when authorized to do so by an act of Congress, but when the Government summoned the offending carrier into court to answer for its failure or refusal to obey the law, the carrier could then plead that the law was not binding upon its conscience or its conduct, because it was contrary to the constitutional guaranty that it shall not be deprived of its property without the due process of law.

But this bill, as it is now proposed to amend it, goes far beyond the question as to the constitutional guaranty of a just compensation and beyond the submission to judicial cognizance of those practices and regulations which involve a property right. This bill provides—and I invite the attention of the Senator from Iowa to the breadth of the language—

> The venue of suits brought in any of the circuit courts against the Commission to enjoin, set aside, annul, or suspend any order—> or requirement of the Commission; * * * and jurisdiction to hear and determine such suits is hereby vested in such courts.

That would be broad enough, but this amendment does not stop with that—

Congress is not required to submit every order or requirement of the Commission to judicial scrutiny. Congress can authorize the Commission to do many things into which the courts are not entitled to inquire. Indeed, sir, Congress can authorize the Commission to do everything except to deprive the carrier of its property without due process of law and without a just compensation. Subject to those limitations, Congress can authorize the Commission to do whatever Congress chooses, and can expressly exclude the acts of the Commission from judicial inquiry.

Does the Senator from Iowa exclude the courts from enjoining anything which the Commission is authorized to do? Every act, important or unimportant, affecting a property right or not affecting a property right, is by the express terms of this amendment submitted to the judgment of the court; and therein lies the difference between a broad review and a narrow review. A broad review is a statutory one—a review that subjects to the determination of the court those matters which constitutionally could be excluded from judicial cognizance. A narrow review is one which auhorizes the court to hear and determine only those matters and things which, because they involve a property right, could not be excluded from judicial determination. If the Senator from Iowa is entirely certain that he wants only to submit to judicial cognizance what can not be excluded, the way is easy. Three lines in this bill can accomplish it. But it is the determination of our friends on the other side to open the doors of the court, not only as wide as they can swing, but it appears to me that they have determined to take the doors off the hinges, so that Congress will not hereafter be tempted to narrow that review.

I congratulate the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], who denies the soft impeachment of the Senator from Maryland, and modestly disavows any part in this arrangement; and yet from the beginning of this long debate to this day the one insistance of the Senator from Rhode Island has been for a broad court review. He has at last obtained what he wants, and hence he is so well satisfied with this amendment. Some Senators may not know what they have agreed to do, but the Senator from Rhode Island is not one of them.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. ALDRICH. I stand exactly where the Senator from Texas stood when he said in this presence: "I will not vote for any bill that does not open wide the doors of the courts of the United States to all the people of the United States."

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, no! The Senator stops short of the quotation—"to protect their constitutional rights."

Mr. ALDRICH. That is an addition which the Senator now makes to his original statement.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator is mistaken. The Senator from Texas said then and he says now he will not be a party to any proposition which attempts to cheat the Constitution and to deprive the courts of a power which is constitutionally theirs. That is what I said then. That is what I say now.

Mr. ALDRICH. The people of the United States have no rights—no property rights or other rights—except such as are guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Rhode Island is mistaken again. We have numerous political rights which——

Mr. ALDRICH. I should perhaps have said property rights.

Mr. BAILEY. Which are under no guaranty of the Constitution of the United States. We have numerous personal rights which are not secured by any constitution, State or Federal. Indeed, Mr. President, the only property right which we enjoy under the Constitution of the United States is that our property shall not be taken from us without due process of law, or without a just compensation. All the property rights we hold subject to the control and disposition of the Federal Government are under those two limitations. Those limitations I cheerfully respect, and, Mr. President, if I were going to make another constitution, I would write in it those same limitations, just as our fathers wrote them in the one under which we must now legislate. I believe in a written constitution. I will grant to no body of men that can be chosen the right to legislate, without limitation, upon the essential rights of the citizen. That is the difference between a Democrat and a Republican. That is what makes us Democrats and that is what makes you Republicans and what made your ancestors Whigs. We not only believe in a written constitution, but we believe in construing every line and letter of it strictly to serve its purpose. You believe in a broad construction of the Constitution as well as broad court review. I think you honestly believe it; or, at least, most of you do. You believe as honestly in that as I do in my theory, because you trust more to the wisdom and to the justice of the living than you do to the restraining enactments of the dead. Just as if I were writing a constitution I would write those provisions in it, so when I am writing a law under that Constitution, I desire that there shall be written in it such, but only such, jurisdiction to the courts as the Constitution commands us to give them.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President, I think I have been a persistent, if not a consistent, advocate of what we have come to call the restricted or narrow review. I fully agree with the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] that there is a clear distinction between what we have called and what we mean by a restricted review and that which we term the broad review. I believe, and have contended throughout this discussion, that under the Constitution we can not deprive a carrier or a party affected by the orders of the Commission of the right to have every such order tested as to its constitutionality or as to whether the Commission had the power or authority under the grant of Congress to prescribe it. And I believe unless we specifically give the courts the power to go beyond that, that is the limit to which the courts can go or will go in any case.

There is and has been a wide misapprehension as to the nature and extent of the controversy which has been going on here between the so-called "narrow" and the so-called "wide" review advocates. There seems to be an impression among some that one party has contended that there should be no court review whatever of the orders of the Commission. There has been no such contention, Mr. President. It has been conceded by all that the parties affected by the orders of the Commission have the right to have tested in court the question as to whether or not their constitutional rights have been invaded or the Commission has exceeded its authority. We have contended that the parties have this right whether it be so written in the statute or not; that it is not necessary to write any such authorization in the statute in order to vest such right in the parties affected by any order of the Commission.

But we contend further that if such authorization shall be inserted in the statute, it will not in the least extend the powers of the court to inquire into or to review the orders, unless the statute shall go further and provide that the courts may also review the discretion which is vested in the Commission to make the orders, and right there I contend is the boundary line between the restricted and the broad review. The question is whether or not we shall allow the parties affected by the orders of the court to have a judicial inquiry beyond the constitutional question into the question of the wisdom of the exercise by the Commission of its discretionary powers under the act of Congress. Clearly, such right never exists unless affirmatively and in terms granted by Congress, and neither by the original text nor as proposed to be amended is or will such right be granted.

Mr. President, these have been the issues. Now, the Senator from Iowa offers an amendment to the provision we have commonly called the "venue clause" in the pending bill. So far as that particular amendment is concerned, in view of the criticisms which have been offered against it, I think I ought to say that I acknowledge something of responsibility for its presentation here. I think I can safely say that I am the sole, lone, and exclusive author of the words "and jurisdiction to hear and determine such suits is hereby vested in such courts." I assume the responsibility for having suggested and written those words. I make no claim to having originated the thought or idea. The suggestion that some amendment of that character should be made has been advanced during the discussion of this bill by several. But as for the particular words here employed and their insertion as proposed, I admit and assume entire responsibility. I suggested them to the Senator from Iowa, and at his request put them in writing exactly as they here appear without suggestion from or consultation with any person whomsoever. Whatever of responsibility this admission entails, I willingly assume.

I undertake to say, Mr. President, and I think I can prove, that the addition of these words to this section do in no wise extend or enlarge the powers of the court to review the orders of the Commission. Let us take the language of the bill as it is without the proposed amendment:

> The venue of suits brought in any of the circuit courts of the United States to enjoin, set aside, annul, or suspend any order or requirement of the Commission shall be in the district where the carrier against whom such order or requirement may have been made has its principal operating office.

That is the language of the bill as it stands to-day. I ask the Senate what does that language mean? "The venue of suits brought in any of the circuit courts of the United States to enjoin, set aside, or annul" the orders of the Commission shall be in certain circuit courts of the United States in certain districts. Does not that contemplate and imply that those courts shall have jurisdiction to try, "hear, and determine such cases?" It has been contended, of course, that the clause quoted would not vest in the courts jurisdiction in such cases. I have always contended that it would and that it is immaterial whether or not it would, because the courts would have the jurisdiction without an express provision granting it to inquire whether or not an order invades a party's constitutional rights. I ask Senators is it not a most illogical and absurd proposition to assert that the venue of a certain class of cases shall be in certain districts, in certain courts therein, and yet deny that those courts have jurisdiction to hear and determine them?

Mr. RAYNER. Let me ask the Senator——

Mr. FULTON. No; the Senator is already scheduled for the next amendment to complete his speech, and I think he ought not to appear in advance of the announcement. If the Senator will kindly pardon me, I must hurry along, because I have little time. I may also have to advertise dates for the future.

Mr. President, whatever may be the views of Senators as to whether or not this venue clause vests the jurisdiction in the courts mentioned, I assume that everyone will admit that it was intended to confer such jurisdiction, or, at least, to acknowledge it, because, as I have said, it would be the most absurd proposition imaginable to say to a party, "We realize that you have a right to maintain a certain action, you may maintain a suit to test the constitutionality of the orders of the Commission, but you must try the case in this particular court," and then when the party comes into that court to try the case deny the jurisdiction of the court to entertain the suit.

Then, Mr. President, if it be a fact that the granting or acknowledgment of jurisdiction was contemplated in this venue clause, tell me how much it adds, how much it enlarges, how much it extends the jurisdiction of the courts to simply add the words "and jurisdiction to hear and determine such suits is hereby vested in such courts."

Suppose this bill should be enacted without changing the venue clause or adding the proposed amendment. Would it be contended that it was the purpose of Congress to designate the courts in which any suit to test the validity of an order of the Commission should be brought and yet to deny to such courts jurisdiction to hear and determine such suits? What, think you, was the purpose of inserting this venue clause? Was it intended as a delusion and a snare?

Clearly the framers of this bill recognized the fact that suits might and would be instituted to test the validity of orders; that under the Constitution the right to prosecute such suits might not be denied, but that Congress might designate in what court they should be prosecuted, and it was deemed important so to do, hence this venue provision.

But, Mr. President, do the words "jurisdiction to hear and determine such suits is vested in such courts" in any wise broaden the right of review? Let us see. What suits are referred to in the amendment? Manifestly the suits the venue of which is fixed in certain courts. No other or different character of suits are brought in by the amendment. Then, how can it be contended that an enlarged jurisdiction is thereby given? Simply jurisdiction to hear and determine such suits, namely, the suits the venue of which is provided for in the original text, is granted. Was it not designed that such courts should have jurisdiction to hear and determine such? If not, why stipulate the place of trial when there could be no trial?

Do the words "to hear and determine" enlarge the right of review? Clearly not, for they are words the legal import of which is well understood. "Jurisdiction to hear and determine" signifies only that the court is empowered to hear and determine the case according to the legal rights of the parties as they shall appear; they do not in any degree define the scope of the inquiry. It therefore clearly appears that this amendment adds nothing to the jurisdiction of the courts except to make it clear that there is no purpose to deny a party whatever right he may have under the Constitution to a judicial investigation to ascertain whether or not his constitutional rights have been invaded, or the authority of the Commission exceeded. How far, then, under such a provision will the courts go in reviewing the orders of the Commission? In answer to that I lay down this proposition:

Where Congress confides to an administrative board or commission such as this discretionary power, the courts will not review or inquire into its orders or proceedings in the exercise of such discretion further than to ascertain whether or not it has exceeded the power vested in it or, what is the same in effect, violated the constitutional rights of a party affected by any such order or proceeding, unless the statute specifically and in unquestionable terms authorizes it to review such discretion.

Now, here you will observe no such authority is given or implied. The provision is that all suits "brought to enjoin, set aside, annul, or suspend an order of the Commission" shall be brought in certain courts, which shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine them. That is simply a recognition of the admitted fact that the right to bring such suits can not be denied, for, as I have said and as has been said by every Senator who has participated in this discussion, the right to a judicial inquiry to ascertain whether or not a party's rights under the Constitution have been invaded, or the authority of the Commission exceeded, can not be denied, hence it is here recognized. True, it is not specifically provided that the inquiry shall cease when that fact has been determined, but such is the rule, unless specific authority for further inquiry be given.

Now, on that proposition I wish to call the attention of the Senate, just briefly without reading in extenso, to the case of the San Diego Land Company v. National City, in 174 U. S. The court there is discussing how far judicial review of rates fixed by a commission just such as this may be had without express and specific authority. This is what the court said, Mr. Justice Harlan announcing the decision:

> But it should also be remembered that the judiciary ought not to interfere with the collection of rates established under legislative sanction unless they are so plainly and palpably unreasonable—

> unless they are so plainly and palpably unreasonable as to make their enforcement equivalent to the taking of property for public use without such compensation as under all the circumstances is just both to the owner and to the public—that is, judicial interference should never occur unless the case presents, clearly and beyond all doubt, such a flagrant attack upon the rights of property under the guise of regulations as to compel the court to say that the rates prescribed will necessarily have the effect to deny just compensation for private property taken for the public use.

Mr. President, that is the limit to which the court will go unless there is some specific authority found in the statute for doing otherwise; and it is reasonable, logical, and just, because Congress in the exercise of its legislative authority has vested in the Commission discretionary power, and the courts never review the exercise of discretionary power unless there is a specific provision for it or unless abuse of it can be shown.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. FULTON. It is hard to refuse the Senator. I have refused others.

Mr. BACON. I simply wanted to ask the Senator, referring to the proposed amendment which he is now discussing, whether under the terms of the proposed amendment there is any order or requirement which it is possible for the Commission to make which this amendment does not give specific jurisdiction both to hear and to determine?

Mr. FULTON. No, in one sense; yes, in another. I will answer the Senator this way: There is no suit that may be filed attacking the validity of the orders of the Commission on the ground that they are unconstitutional of which those courts will not take jurisdiction, but the court will take jurisdiction simply for the purpose of protecting the constitutional rights of the parties. The courts will inquire whether or not constitutional rights have been invaded, and if they find that they have not they will drop the suit then and there and dismiss it.

Mr. BACON. If that is the case, what possible objection can the Senator have to the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland, which prescribes that very thing?

Mr. FULTON. That is a very natural question. While we understand in a general and in a sufficiently definite way to what extent the court will go in cases of this character where no specific provision for reviewing the discretion of the Commission is given, yet the Senator knows very well, because he is an able lawyer, that when we enter upon the work of prescribing the limits of the jurisdiction of the court to exercise its judicial power we are treading on very dangerous ground. It is the wiser course to let the court determine the extent of its power in that respect. How far they will go we know with sufficient certainty to be assured that under this provision they will not review the Commission's discretion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I have retained my seat in the Senate while I have been in the city during the whole discussion of this subject. I have felt that perhaps I ought to continue to do so, but in view of my past relation to the subject and the expectation that I should say something upon it I have concluded to make a very few remarks.

Mr. President, I am in favor of the adoption of the amendments offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

When the Hepburn bill unanimously passed the House, and was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce of the Senate, ill health necessitated my absence from Washington. I did not have the opportunity or facilities to examine the legal phase of the subject. Without special investigation, I supposed, as a matter of course, that the railroads would have the right under that bill, without amendment, to appeal to the courts if the rates prescribed by the Commission invaded any right guaranteed to them by the Constitution. The agitation for an amendment to the interstate-commerce act of 1887 has been going on for nearly ten years, until the patience of the people of the whole country has become nearly exhausted, and my main anxiety was to secure the passage of an effective bill at the earliest possible date.

The Hepburn bill having unanimously passed the House, and seeming to embody the more important features deemed essential to an effective act, I favored the passage of that bill without amendment.

The general provision in that bill that the orders of the Commission shall remain in effect until set aside by the Commission itself, or by a court of competent jurisdiction, taken in connection with the judicial power as defined by the Constitution and laws of the United States, extending as it does to all cases in law and equity arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States, and the general right of every man to appeal to the court if his constitutional rights are invaded, appeared then to me to be sufficient to confer upon the circuit court jurisdiction to protect the rights of the carrier under the Constitution, without any specific provision conferring such jurisdiction upon the circuit courts.

But as this great debate has developed the subject, and I have examined the decisions of the courts, I think it extremely doubtful if the circuit courts of the United States can take jurisdiction without such jurisdiction is expressly conferred upon them.

The decisions of the Supreme Court since the days of Chief Justice Marshall and extending to the present, many of which have already been quoted here, seem to make it reasonably clear that the circuit courts of the United States, having been created by statute, can have no jurisdiction but such as the statute confers. And, as stated by the court itself, the circuit courts of the United States are created by act of Congress, and it is necessary in every attempt to define their power to look to that source as a means of accomplishing that end.

The decisions of the Supreme Court have convinced me that it would be unsafe, to say the least, to pass this bill without inserting therein a clause expressly conferring jurisdiction upon the circuit courts of the United States.

Mr. President, if we could constitutionally do so, I would not hesitate to confer upon the Interstate Commerce Commission the absolute, unreviewable power to fix rates.

I believe that the Interstate Commerce Commission is a much more competent body to fix a railroad rate than is a court of the United States.

Deriving their appointment from the same source, they should be as able and as competent as the circuit judges of the United States. In addition, the Commission gives its whole time and attention to the consideration of all the details connected with the fixing of rates and the management of railroad property. Without at all reflecting upon our United States courts, the Interstate Commerce Commissioners necessarily become far more expert in this branch of the subject than any circuit court can possibly become.

Judge Grosscup, an able circuit judge of the United States, has recently said that one of the difficulties in the administration of the law is that the circuit judges are totally incompetent to pass upon the question of rates. Judge Grosscup made this statement, not as a reflection on the learning and ability of circuit judges, but because of the intricacy of the question and the vast amount of other important work which is the daily life of the circuit judge. As he expressed it—

> The circuit judge one day is exploring the intricacies of a patent case, another day he is hearing a personal-injury case, another he is hearing some customs case, another he is pursuing the meanderings of some chancery case. Every day brings up some new subject covering some wide area upon which he must be specially educated for the day's judgment. * * * Now, call him from this judgment seat to decide upon a question, the most perplexing, the most difficult question to a man who has had no education, no vision of the subject upon which he is expected to rule. Thus I say that the circuit court is an incompetent court.

Mr. President, I was no less forcibly impressed with the reasoning of Mr. Justice Bradley, than whom no abler man has occupied a seat in the Supreme Court, in his dissent in the Minnesota case.

He said:

> It is complained that the decisions of the board are final and without appeal. So are the decisions of the court in matters within their jurisdiction. There must be a final tribunal somewhere for deciding every question in the world. Injustice takes place in every tribunal. All human institutions are imperfect—courts as well as commissions and legislatures. Whatever tribunal has jurisdiction, its decisions are final and conclusive, unless appeal is given therefrom. The important question always is, What is the lawful tribunal for a particular case? In my judgment in the present case the proper tribunal was the legislature or the board of commissioners which it created for the purpose.

It will thus be seen from the reading of the decision of Mr. Justice Bradley that he did not manifest the distrust of the Commission as a competent body upon which to be conferred the absolute power to fix rates, which we so frequently hear both in and out of Congress.

But I understand very well, Mr. President, under the decision of the Minnesota case, that neither Congress nor the legislature can confer this power upon a commission to fix a rate which shall be final and not subject to review by the courts.

Mr. President, I am not in favor of a general or broad right of review by the courts, and neither do I think that that portion of the pending amendment conferring jurisdiction upon the circuit court confers a broad right review. It does not do it in terms, and, in my judgment, it will not be so construed by the courts. If this bill shall become a law, I do not want it to be shorn of much of its usefulness by judicial construction, as was the act of 1887.

The court should not be permitted to go into the whole question of the reasonableness of the rate fixed by the Commission, because the fixing of the rate is a legislative function, and the Commission is a much more competent body to fix a rate than is any court of the United States.

The proper province of the court is to determine whether the Commission exceeded its authority, and whether the rate fixed by it contravenes the right of the carrier guaranteed by the fifth amendment to the Constitution, that property shall not be taken without due process of law, nor without just compensation.

Mr. President, there is a great difference between the jurisdiction of the court over a rate fixed by the railroad itself and a rate fixed by Congress or the Commission.

In a controversy between a shipper and a railroad the courts very properly go into the whole question of the reasonableness of such rate. But in a controversy over a rate fixed by a commission the proper function of the court is to inquire whether the rate is so unreasonably low as to amount to confiscation under the fifth amendment.

This is true, because when Congress delegates to the Commission the fixing of a rate and the Commission fixes the rate it is practically the same as if the rate were prescribed by Congress itself. It is practically a rate fixed by law, and all that the court can properly pass upon is whether the law-made rate violates any constitutional right of the carrier.

This, in my judgment, is the extent to which the court would review the rate. This is especially true where jurisdiction is merely given in general terms, as in this amendment, to hear and determine the controversy without expressly providing that the court shall pass upon the reasonableness of the rate.

Mr. President, I do not see that there is anything inconsistent on the part of Senators who favored the adoption of the Hepburn bill without amendment in favoring the pending amendment conferring jurisdiction on the circuit court.

When I favored the passage of the Hepburn bill without amendment I knew that the carrier could not be denied the right of appeal to the courts, and I thought that the Hepburn bill as it passed the House contained sufficient provision on that subject.

The adoption of the jurisdiction portion of the pending amendment will not confer upon the courts any greater jurisdiction than the friends of the Hepburn bill thought it contained when it passed the House. I consider it merely declaratory of something which we thought was already contained in the bill.

If the Hepburn bill as it passed the House contains sufficient provision for review by the courts, this amendment providing "jurisdiction to hear and determine such suits is hereby vested in such courts" will not broaden the scope of the review. Whatever the courts could have constitutionally done under the terms of the bill as it passed the House they can constitutionally do under this amendment, and no more.

On the other hand, if the bill as it passed the House does not contain sufficient provision for review, and is therefore unconstitutional, this amendment will render the bill constitutional.

The amendment does not confer in terms a broad right of review. It does not define to what extent the rate fixed by the Commission can be reviewed by the court. In the absence of such provision, I believe that the courts will hold that they will not interfere with a rate fixed by the Commission unless the Commission exceeded its authority or unless the rate fixed amounts to confiscation under the fifth amendment.

Mr. President, I do not think there is any danger of the courts exercising any greater power of review than to determine whether the rate fixed by the Commission is in violation of the constitutional rights of the carrier.

As the subject has been so thoroughly developed here, and the general provisions of the bill, especially the provision that the Commission shall prescribe a rate which, in its judgment, is reasonable and just, the manifest intent on the part of Congress that the court shall not unduly interfere with the rate fixed by the Commission, to my mind, make it certain, even though the courts have the power, they will be loath to overturn a rate fixed by the Commission unless it is so manifestly unjust as to amount to the taking of property without just compensation.

In passing upon rates fixed by the Commission, under the fifth amendment, the courts have considerable latitude, and all the latitude which they should be given.

It is said that under the fifth amendment the rate fixed by the Commission must amount to "confiscation" before the court can set it aside. In a legal sense this is perhaps true, but the term "confiscation" has always seemed to me misleading when used in this connection.

The term "confiscation" conveys to the ordinary mind the taking of property without any compensation. If that were held to be its meaning, the courts would have a very narrow jurisdiction. But under the fifth amendment the railroad is entitled to a just compensation for the services performed, and that just compensation has been defined to be a fair return upon the reasonable value of the property at the time it is being used for the public. (Kansas City Stock Yards case, 183 U. S., 90.)

So, Mr. President, it will be seen that the courts will have a reasonably wide latitude in passing upon the rate fixed by the Commission.

Mr. President, this is the essential feature of the pending amendment, but it contains other excellent provisions. I am referring now to the amendment offered by me on behalf of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

I have always been much in favor of striking out the words "and fairly remunerative." In my judgment they should never have been inserted in the original bill.

The rate to be fixed by the Commission should be a "just and reasonable" rate, because the meaning of those terms is well understood and has been passed upon many times by the courts. The addition of the words "and fairly remunerative" might bring a new element of consideration into the fixing of the rate. A just and reasonable rate would probably be a fairly remunerative rate, and vice versa. To say the least, the words are surplusage and should be stricken from the bill, if they have not already been.

The pending amendment also contains a provision leaving it within the discretion of the Commission, within a limit of two years, as to the time when the rate shall continue in effect. This will give the necessary elasticity, so that rates may be readily changed, if found necessary.

The limitation on the granting of preliminary injunctions is also a very wise provision. It is in a sense a compromise between a prohibition against granting of preliminary injunctions and leaving the court absolutely free to grant such injunctions. Under this provision the Commission will have ample time to appear and resist the granting of an injunction.

With these amendments adopted I think the pending bill will be not only constitutional, but will prove very effective legislation.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do not design speaking over four or five minutes at the outside. I do, however, want to ask the attention of Senators, according to all of us the common desire to accomplish the best in this regard, while I present this question in just a few words and without elaboration.

There is no question, I presume, in the minds of lawyers that in the absence of any distinct conferring of jurisdiction by this act, the United States courts would have all power to review any decision which affected the constitutional rights of the parties; in other words, nothing that we can incorporate in this bill can take that away from the citizen, because a law, which is superior to us, guarantees to him those rights and has conferred upon the courts the power and the duty to maintain those rights for the citizen. But there is a domain outside of that—outside of the rights specifically protected by the Constitution—in which it is within the power of Congress to confer or to withhold jurisdiction from the courts.

The point I wish to ask the attention of Senators to for their candid, unbiased, and unprejudiced judgment is this: Under the terms of this proposed amendment, if we adopt it—I am speaking now of the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON]—under the letter of it, under the words of it—is there one single order or requirement of the Commission which, so far as we can confer it—the jurisdiction—we do not confer in this proposed amendment? If it is adopted, we confer upon the court the power not only to hear, but to determine every question which can arise as to any order or requirement of the Commission. Let me read the language as found on page 317 of this print of the amendments. I asked the Senator from Oregon [Mr. FULTON] the question as to this, and I was not entirely content with his reply, because I did not think it was definite and candid. Of course I know he intended to be candid, but his reply did not cover the question. If I may have the attention of Senators for two or three minutes, I desire to say that the language of that amendment, omitting words unnecessary for this discussion, is this:

> The venue of suits * * * to enjoin, set aside, annul, or suspend any order or requirement shall be, etc., and jurisdiction to hear and determine such suits is hereby vested in such courts.

Paraphrasing the language, it would read in this way:

> Jurisdiction to hear and determine any order or requirement of the Commission is hereby vested in such courts.

That is what the language means; that is what it is when paraphrased.

Those Senators who are in favor of conferring on the courts jurisdiction to review every order and every requirement of course can consistently support that amendment; but as to Senators who have stood here for months and asserted, both in public and in private, that they are not willing that the courts shall have the jurisdiction and the power to hear and determine questions outside of the constitutional questions, how can such Senators now defend themselves on the ground of consistency? They can only do so by adopting the position taken by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. FULTON], in which he says that, while this language does confer this power upon the courts, the courts will not exercise it. That is practically what the Senator from Oregon said.

Mr. FULTON. Will the Senator allow me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. FULTON. I simply desire to interrupt the Senator to make a correction, for he certainly does not intend to misrepresent what I said.

Mr. BACON. The Senator knows I do not.

Mr. FULTON. I did not, with all deference to the Senator, say that we granted the power to the court, but that the court would not exercise it. I said if we granted to the court the power to hear and determine suits that should be brought to test the validity of an order of the Commission, without granting specific authority to go beyond the constitutional inquiry, which we do not grant, the courts will not go into an inquiry as to whether or not the Commission has wisely exercised its discretion, but will simply inquire whether or not the constitutional rights of the party has been invaded, and if not, will dismiss the suit.

Mr. BACON. I ask the Senator, if that was his position, why it was he was opposed to the amendment of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] which proposes to confer that power upon the courts?

But, Mr. President, what the Senator says—and I do not desire now to enter into a colloquy with him on the subject, because my time is so limited, and I promised not to occupy as much time as I have already done—but the Senator said that the court in taking jurisdiction is not going to be governed by the language of this law, but by what they conceive to be their duty outside of the law and outside of the expressed jurisdiction which we by this language confer.

Now, I ask the Senator in his reply to indicate a single order or a single requirement of the Commission which this proposed amendment, if it is ingrafted upon this law, will not give to the circuit court of the United States jurisdiction both to hear and to determine?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me, I shall be glad to have him answer the question in his own time.

Mr. CARTER. The Senator propounded a question.

Mr. BACON. I know, but I said I hoped any Senator who would answer it would reply in his own time. If the Senate will give me extra time I will be glad to hear the Senator.

Mr. CARTER. I have no time to give.

Mr. BACON. The Senator has his time. He has not spoken on this amendment and will have fifteen minutes in which to do it.

I want to call attention now to another matter to see if the defense, if I may so term it, of this amendment is well founded when it is claimed that the amendment does not enlarge the jurisdiction which is contained in the original Hepburn bill. The original Hepburn bill read in this way:

> The venue of suits brought in any of the circuit courts of the United States to enjoin, set aside, annul, or suspend any order or requirement of the Commission shall be in the district where the carrier against whom such order or requirement may have been made has its principal operating office.

It is contended that that gives jurisdiction to the courts, not simply to hear a complaint, but upon such hearing to enjoin, set aside, annul, or suspend any order or requirement, and that these additional words contained in the proposed amendment which specificially confer that jurisdiction "to hear and determine" do not enlarge the power which the original Hepburn bill conferred upon them.

Why, Mr. President, what do these words in the original bill mean when they say:

> The venue of suits brought in any of the circuit courts of the United States to enjoin, set aside, annul, or suspend any order or requirement of the Commission?

They simply mean that whenever any person shall claim the right to have such an injunction on account of any order or any requirement of the Commission, the venue to hear that contention, the place and the court where and by which that contention shall be heard, shall be the place and the court specified in this bill. But it is incredible that any lawyer will upon careful consideration claim that that language in the original House bill confers the jurisdiction not only "to hear," but "to determine" every complaint as to any order or requirement of the Commission, and to enjoin or set aside any such order or requirement. It is an impossibility. It simply designates the venue in which, when any person makes application to enjoin any order or requirement of the Commission, the court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine whether that is a legitimate matter for it to take into consideration. It is the territorial jurisdiction I speak of when I use the word "jurisdiction;" but not the legal jurisdiction. It is the venue and venue only—not the jurisdiction to hear and determine. A court may have territorial jurisdiction and still not have legal jurisdiction of the subject-matter; and that is the entire scope of it.

Mr. President, the learned lawyers who added these words were not indifferent to that view of the matter, and the learned lawyers who for months have been considering this question were not indifferent to the proposition that it was necessary, not simply to designate the court which should have the territorial jurisdiction, which should have the venue within which parties aggrieved might ask the aid of the courts, but such fixing of the venue does not confer jurisdictional powers upon the courts as to the subjects-matter. With the venue thus alone fixed the courts would only have such jurisdictional power over the subject-matter as they would have independently of this particular act. The astute lawyers who framed this proposed amendment well knew this. And therefore to secure what they call the "broad review"—the review to secure which this debate has been protracted for three months—they well knew it was necessary to go further and to say that the particular things for the hearing of which the venue had previously been fixed should constitute matter over which the court, thus having the territorial jurisdiction or the venue, should also have the legal jurisdiction to hear and determine. Everybody inside and outside of this Chamber knows that those who have been contending for the broad review, the unlimited review, have condemned in unmeasured terms this provision of the House bill on the ground that the review which it authorized was not broad enough to protect the rights of the railroads; and now forsooth those who stood with us have surrendered, and now applaud this unlimited amendment on the ground that it means exactly what the original provision in the House bill means.

Mr. President, what have we been talking about here for three months if it be true that this means the same thing as the provision in the House bill and does not enlarge the jurisdiction?

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator yield to me for a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BACON. I would never decline an interruption by the Senator.

Mr. ALLISON. Suppose the situation is such that this administrative Commission, exercising power under this bill, if it shall become a law, makes an order respecting a rate, and some carrier or somebody else brings a suit against the Commission, will the courts say that they will examine those questions where discretion has actually and properly been given by law to the Commission, no property right being involved?

Mr. BACON. If the court does not do it, it would be because the court would say that Congress had no right to pass this bill and adopt this amendment, for this amendment does not restrict it in any way.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well. The court simply will not examine into that question; otherwise this administrative board is annihilated.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the language of this proposed amendment makes no restriction whatever. It is absolutely broad, absolutely limitless, and the Senator only takes refuge behind the proposition that the court will not exercise the jurisdiction which this amendment confers upon it, or proposes to do.

Mr. ALLISON. I take no shelter, but I want to ask the Senator, if it turns out that in this order no judicial question is involved, will the mere suggestion of jurisdiction give the court jurisdiction?

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, if time permitted, I could go into the proposition as to how far we can confer jurisdiction upon the court which it would not have in the absence of that distinct conferring of power. There is no doubt about the fact that when we prescribe a certain duty for the Commission, whether in its discretion or otherwise, if it is made a legal duty, we can confer upon the court the jurisdiction to hear and determine whether they have violated the law in that regard, and, in the absence of the distinct conferring of it, they would not have the power so to do. But it would be manifestly difficult for me to develop that line of argument without going into it at length and producing authorities. I will say to the Senator, however, that if he will read the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Bradley in the Minneapolis case, he will find that Justice Bradley based his dissenting opinion upon that proposition. While it is a dissenting opinion, the principle involved is not the point upon which the court decided. The majority of the judges—all but three of them who dissented—speaking for the court, put their decision upon an entirely different ground, not in conflict with that particular contention on the part of Judge Bradley; in other words, not in conflict with that legal proposition thus announced by him. They differed, as I understand, in the application.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I have heard all the lawyers in the Senate speak on this subject and several who are not lawyers, and I have read a good many law books in my life and heard a good deal of discussion about the doctrine of common carriers, their liabilities and their obligations, but I never have found any lawyer in this body, or any Senator in this body, or any judge who has ever written on this subject, who takes any exception to the language of this bill on page 3, from line 14 to 19.

The framers of this Hepburn bill in the House put a rudder or a helm on the ship that nobody has disputed as the authority over the whole subject. I will read it:

> All charges made for any service rendered or to be rendered in the transportation of passengers or property as aforesaid, or in connection therewith, shall be just and reasonable; and every unjust and unreasonable charge for such service or any part thereof is prohibited and declared to be unlawful.

An unreasonable and an unjust charge is prohibited and declared to be unlawful by this bill. I have contented myself with that provision of the bill, being perfectly satisfied that Congress has no right to violate it in fixing an exorbitant rate, or a rate that is too low, and that no commission Congress could create could violate that provision by fixing rates that were too high or rates that were too low. But there has to be a tribunal to determine this question of reasonableness or unreasonableness. What tribunal is that under our Constitution? The judicial tribunal. Congress can not enact an arbitrary rate, even under the provisions of this bill, which it can force upon a man against his will, so long as he has the right of appeal to a court to get rid of it; neither can Congress authorize a commission to put either upon the shipper or the carrier an unreasonable rate.

The Senator from Iowa, in his splendid statement of this question, never got to the top of his subject until he finally admitted that all the rates that were to be imposed under this act or any other act that Congress can possibly enact must be just and reasonable.

So we have all met on that ground. We have been together on that ground all the time and have had no differences between ourselves on that ground; and I rested perfectly quiet during this magnificent and tremendous debate about the way of managing the courts so that they might be possibly able to make the rates just and reasonable, or, on the other hand, might possibly be able to make them unjust and unreasonable by a limitation of their authority.

That being so, Mr. President, where do the words "just and reasonable" come from in connection with the obligation of common carriers? Where do we get them from? They do not come out of any statute. They are coeval with the birth of civil jurisprudence. Who invented them and put them forward? The courts. It is a rule of court that all nations and all civilized people of Christendom respect—and nowhere more thoroughly respected than in the last clause of the first section of this bill. It is a perfectly simple proposition that if Congress makes a rate by its own legislative act which is unjust and unreasonable this bill condemns it. It is not within the purview of the powers of Congress under this law to provide for an unjust and unreasonable rate. Suppose Congress taxes an article four times its value in favor of the carrier for transportation; of course this bill would condemn that. What would be the remedy? To go into a court and get rid of it; not to come back to Congress and ask it to pass a different law. All acts of Congress under this great judicial decree, that has been a part of the civil jurisprudence of all Christendom since the courts first undertook to regulate this subject, is amenable and liable to its constraint. You can not get rid of it if you want to do it.

That solves, in my judgment, the whole question that we have been so long debating and so anxiously worrying about here in regard to the jurisdiction of the courts. You can not keep out of the courts a man against whom Congress or a commission assesses an unreasonable rate or a railroad against whom it assesses a rate that is too low. The courts will open their doors to them under this great civic enunciation that has lasted since the dawn of civilization. They will go there and get their relief in spite of all that we can do.

The courts have the final decision of this. Some way will be found to go there. You may destroy all the remedies now known, and the courts themselves, after the fashion of the old common-law courts, will invent remedies in order to get hold of this subject. So I do not really see that there is much in this bill to be discussed, except in regard to the method of handling the subject.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER].

Mr. RAYNER. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SPOONER (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 24, nays 55, as follows:

YEAS—24.

Bacon	Culberson	Latimer	Overman
Bailey	Daniel	McCreary	Rayner
Berry	Dubois	McLaurin	Simmons
Blackburn	Frazier	Martin	Stone
Clarke, Ark.	Gearin	Money	Taliaferro
Clay	La Follette	Newlands	Tillman

NAYS—55.

Aldrich	Clark, Wyo.	Gamble	Nelson
Alger	Crane	Hale	Nixon
Allee	Cullom	Hansbrough	Penrose
Allison	Dick	Hemenway	Perkins
Ankeny	Dillingham	Hopkins	Pettus

Clark, Mont.	Gallinger	Morgan

NOT VOTING—10.

Burton	Gorman	Patterson	Teller
Carmack	Heyburn	Proctor
Depew	Mallory	Spooner

So Mr. RAYNER'S amendment was rejected.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I wish to make a request for unanimous consent. I shall leave the Chamber in less than an hour, and must be absent during the further consideration of the pending measure.

A few days ago I offered an amendment of less than three lines to the Culberson substitute, which was adopted in place of the Foraker amendment, with respect to passes. I should like to have permission now to offer an amendment to the substitute as it exists in the present bill. I think there is no objection to my amendment, which simply provides that owners or persons in charge of live stock may be carried free by the railroads when traveling with stock or when going to place of shipment or returning from place of delivery, and I should be glad to have it incorporated now in the amendment as it stands.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. There is an amendment to the substitute already pending.

Mr. WARREN. There is no amendment pending to it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I make no objection, but I do not see how the Senator is going to get around the parliamentary situation.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent, which of course gets around it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Ah, yes! Let us hear the amendment.

Mr. CULBERSON. I do not know what the temper of the Senate is as to the matter, but I suggest to the Senator from Wyoming that possibly the Senate would now take up the motion to reconsider and adopt it or reject it.

Mr. ALDRICH. I hope we will go on to discuss the next section.

Mr. CULBERSON. Very well.

Mr. ALDRICH. Let the next section be read.

Mr. KEAN. Let the amendment be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request for unanimous consent?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Let the amendment be read first.

The SECRETARY. After the words "charitable institutions" it is proposed to insert:

Or to owners and care takers of live stock when traveling with such stock or when going to point of shipment or returning from point of delivery.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request for unanimous consent?

Mr. BACON. The Senator merely wants to offer it now?

Mr. WARREN. No. I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. BACON. I beg pardon.

Mr. WARREN. For the reason that if a substitute is adopted and this amendment is not now included in the legislation which follows we might not remember to take care of this particular matter.

Mr. CARTER. I will say to the Senator from Wyoming that I have an amendment of the same kind which I intend to offer, and if agreeable I will offer his amendment instead of the one I have prepared.

Mr. WARREN. It is not a matter of any personal concern. If I can be assured that it will be offered in the form in which I now offer it, I will withdraw my request for unanimous consent.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wyoming withdraws his request for unanimous consent. Are there further amendments to section 4?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have an amendment which I desire to offer.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 12, after line 14, at the end of the section, add the following:

If upon the trial of any action brought to set aside or modify any order made by the Commission under this section evidence shall be introduced by the plaintiff which is found by the court to be different from that offered upon the hearing before the Commission, or additional thereto, the court, before proceeding to render judgment, unless the parties to such action stipulate in writing to the contrary, shall transmit a copy of such evidence to the Commission, and shall stay further proceedings in such action for fifteen days from the date of such transmission. Upon the receipt of such evidence the Commission shall consider the same, and may alter, modify, amend, or rescind its order relating to such rate or rates, fares, charges, classification, joint rate or rates, regulation, practice, or service complained of in said action, and shall report its action thereon to said court within ten days from the receipt of such evidence.

If the Commission shall rescind its order complained of, the action shall be dismissed; if it shall alter, modify, or amend the same, such altered, modified, or amended order shall take the place of the original order complained of, and judgment shall be rendered thereon as though made by the Commission in the first instance. If the original order shall not be rescinded or changed by the Commission, judgment shall be rendered upon such original order.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I have offered this amendment, as I have offered others, because I believe it will perfect and strengthen the bill. The Commission has been reversed in thirty-two cases. In twenty-six of those cases, as the record discloses, it has been reversed because testimony was offered upon the trial before the court which was not offered when the case was presented to the Commission. The amendment proposes that if new testimony is offered when the case is on trial by the court, the testimony shall be taken, further action suspended thereon, and the record containing all of the testimony referred to the Commission for its consideration. This would give the Commission the benefit of all the evidence upon which to base its order. If the original order were set aside or modified, the railroad company would then have its opportunity to take the opinion of the court upon the action of the Commission, and the court would have before it the same testimony which the Commission passed upon. This amendment, if adopted, will take away from the railroad companies all inducement to withhold testimony when the Commission tries the case, because they will not be able to reverse the Commission by trying a different case before the court than the case tried before the Commission. There would be small likelihood that the court would disagree with the Commission. There would be less inducement to carry the case to the court and we should hear much less criticism of the Commission.

It would mean certainly a saving of time and a saving of great expense. In many cases which have been appealed from the Commission, where additional testimony was taken before the court, the writing up of the record containing the additional testimony has been a matter of very great expense to the Government. In one case, I remember, the expense was something over $10,000. That case, of course, went on from the circuit court to the Supreme Court, and the Commission was reversed. Had that case been sent back to the Commission, probably it would have been the end of the entire proceeding. If there is any objection to this amendment, I should be glad to hear somebody state it.

Mr. HALE. Question!

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, speaking to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin, I wish to call attention to the fact that a little time ago I offered an amendmen relating to differentials, which I temporarily withdrew. I offered the amendment for the reason that some days ago the Senator in charge of this bill declared that, in his judgment, a flat mileage rate was the proper thing to be enforced, and if I remember correctly the Senator from Texas coincided in that view. It was rather alarming that such a thing could happen, because it would bring such disaster to this country as it is almost inconceivable to think of. It was with a view of preventing that possibility that I offered the amendment. I knew that it was not drawn in the best form, and I hoped that some Senator would offer a substitute which would cover the ground.

But since I withdrew the amendment I have consulted with Senators, and I am satisfied it is, perhaps, an impossible thing to draw an amendment such as ought to be offered covering that point. I have therefore determined, Mr. President, not to offer the amendment again, but before concluding I should like very much indeed to have the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER], who has given great thought to this matter and with whom I have talked on the subject, state to the Senate what his view is as to the power the Interstate Commerce Commission would have over the matter that I attempted to correct. Does the Senator feel that the Interstate Commerce Commission would have power to make a mileage rate, or are their powers largely and perhaps wholly based upon the proposition that they can correct excessive rates?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. GALLINGER. I do, for the purpose of making a statement.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, the theory of the bill is that the Commission shall entertain complaints made before it alleging violations of the interstate-commerce law. The interstate-commerce law has in it four sections which contain its prohibitions. The complaints are to be directed against the railway or the line of railway which is violating the interstate-commerce law. Therefore I feel entirely free to say to the Senator from New Hampshire that the jurisdiction of the Commission is to require the railroad to cease and desist from its violation of the law and to conform its rates to the rates which in their judgment are lawful. I think no fear need be indulged that the Commission would go to the extreme of establishing a mileage system of rates in the United States. I certainly would regret it if that should be done, because the whole fabric of our market place would be disturbed by any such general change in the framework of our transportation system.

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. Is it not true that in all the cases in which the Commission undertook to fix rates, prior to 1897, when the Maximum Rate case was decided, it did virtually fix them upon an approximate mileage basis?

Mr. DOLLIVER. I think that can not be properly said.

Mr. FORAKER. It certainly did in the Maximum Rate case fix what was approximately a mileage basis.

Mr. DOLLIVER. The theory of the Commission in the Maximum Rate case was simply to reduce rates from Cincinnati to points in the Southeast to what the Commission found to be reasonable and just. I am sure it may be said of that case that they did not establish any system of mileage rates, but they did proclaim a system of equitable rates, of course counting distance as one of the elements that enters into the making of a just and reasonable rate.

Mr. FORAKER. That is all I contend for. Of course in the order it did not so appear, but in the opinion the Commission announced that was taken as the basis of their reasoning.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I never attempt to accomplish the impossible, and after having consulted with some of the most eminent lawyers in the Senate, who gave it to me as their opinion that an amendment covering this point could not be drawn which would be satisfactory, and upon the statement made by the Senator from Iowa, who has given this matter very great thought, I am quite content to let the matter rest, and I will not reoffer the amendment I withdrew a little while ago.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], on which the Senator from Wisconsin demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STONE. Several Senators here would like to have the amendment read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri suggests that the amendment be again read. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 12, after line 14, at the end of the section, add the following:

If upon the trial of any action brought to set aside or modify any order made by the Commission under this section evidence shall be introduced by the plaintiff which is found by the court to be different from that offered upon the hearing before the Commission, or additional thereto, the court before proceeding to render judgment, unless the parties to such action stipulate in writing to the contrary, shall transmit a copy of such evidence to the Commission, and shall stay further proceedings in such action for fifteen days from the date of such transmission. Upon the receipt of such evidence the Commission shall consider the same, and may alter, modify, amend, or rescind its order relating to such rate or rates, fares, charges, classification, joint rate or rates, regulation, practice, or service complained of in said action, and shall report its action thereon to said court within ten days from the receipt of such evidence.

If the Commission shall rescind its order complained of, the action shall be dismissed; if it shall alter, modify, or amend the same, such altered, modified, or amended order shall take the place of the original order complained of, and judgment shall be rendered thereon as though made by the Commission in the first instance. If the original order shall not be rescinded or changed by the Commission, judgment shall be rendered upon such original order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

The question having been taken by yeas and nays, the result was announced—yeas 26, nays 49, as follows:

YEAS—26.

Bacon	Culberson	Latimer	Rayner
Bailey	Daniel	McCreary	Simmons
Berry	Dubois	McLaurin	Taliaferro

Carmack	Frye	Patterson

So Mr. LA FOLLETTE's amendment was rejected.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the fifth section be now read.

Mr. TILLMAN. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the next section.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I desire to offer, before we pass to the other section, the following, which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin proposes an amendment, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, at the end of section 4——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Not at the end of section 4, but as a substitute for section 4, or section 15 of the act of 1889.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin proposes a substitute for section 4, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 10 of the bill, after line 6, strike out the remainder of the section and insert:

SEC. 15. That the Commission is authorized and empowered, and it shall be its duty, whenever, after full hearing upon any inquiry instituted by the Commission upon its own motion or upon a complaint made, as provided in section 13 of this act, or upon complaint of any common carrier, it shall be of the opinion that any of the rates or charges whatsoever demanded, charged, or collected by any common carrier or carriers subject to the provisions of this act, for the transportation of persons or property as defined in the first section of this act, or that any regulations or practices whatsoever of such carrier or carriers affecting such transportation are unjust or unreasonable, or unjustly discriminatory or unduly preferential or prejudicial, or otherwise in violation of any of the provisions of this act, to determine and prescribe what will, in its judgment, be the just and reasonable rate or rates, charge or charges, to be thereafter observed; and in so doing the Commission shall have power (a) to fix a maximum rate; (b) to fix a differential and to prescribe both a maximum and a minimum rate, to enforce the same when that may be necessary to prevent discriminations forbidden by the third section, but not otherwise; (c) to change the classification of any article; (d) to determine what regulation or practice in respect to such transportation is just and reasonable to be thereafter followed and to make an order that the carrier shall cease and desist from such violation to the extent to which the Commission find the same to exist and shall not thereafter publish, demand, or collect any rate or charge for such transportation in violation of the rate or charge so prescribed and shall conform to the regulation or practice so prescribed. Such order shall go into effect thirty days after notice to the carrier and shall remain in force and be observed by the carrier, unless the same shall be suspended or modified or set aside by the Commission or be suspended or set aside by a court of competent jurisdiction. Whenever the carriers shall fail to agree among themselves upon the apportionment or division of such joint rates, fares, or charges the Commission may, after hearing, make a supplemental order prescribing the portion of such joint rate to be received by each carrier party thereto, which order shall take effect as a part of the original order.

The Commission is also authorized and empowered, and it shall be its duty, whenever, after full hearing upon any inquiry instituted by the Commission upon its own motion or upon a complaint made, as provided in section 13 of this act, or upon complaint of any common carrier, to establish through routes and joint rates to be charged and to prescribe the division of such rates as hereinbefore provided and the terms and conditions under which such through routes shall be operated, when that may be necessary to give effect to any provisions of this act and the carriers complained of have refused or neglected to voluntarily establish such through routes and joint rates. Such authority shall extend to the establishment of through routes and through rates wholly by railroad and partly by railroad and partly by water.

If the owner of property transported under this act directly or indirectly renders any service connected with such transportation, or furnishes any instrumentality used therein, the charge and allowance therefor shall be no more than is just and reasonable, and the Commission may, after hearing on a complaint, determine what is a reasonable charge as the maximum to be paid by the carrier or carriers for the service so rendered or for the use of the instrumentality so furnished, and fix the same by appropriate order, which order shall have the same force and effect and be enforced in like manner as the orders above provided for in this section.

The foregoing enumeration of powers shall not exclude any power which the Commission would otherwise have in the making of an order under the provisions of this act.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I will take the time of the Senate at this late hour to state very briefly the difference between the substitute which I propose and section 15 of the pending bill.

Section 15 provides that the Commission shall have authority to fix a maximum rate. The proposed amendment gives the Commission authority to fix a maximum rate and, under certain circumstances, a minimum rate, and also gives them control of classification.

That states in a few words substantially the difference between section 15 of the pending bill and the amendment which I have proposed. The bill prepared by the Commission and submitted to the committees of Congress having charge of this legislation contains the essential provisions of the substitute which I propose for section 15. In the general debate I set forth at some length the reasons why section 15 should be amended and the changes which I believed should be made in it. I will not take the time to go into it more fully at present.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, I think it is due to the committee to say a word about these provisions. The substitute which my honorable friend from Wisconsin has offered presents two or three matters of importance. The first one is that his substitute clothes the Interstate Commerce Commission with power to originate complaints. That is one of the things which they did not include in the bill which they sent to the committee.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Certainly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. In view of the fact that I have spoken and am precluded from speaking again, will the Senator from Iowa yield to me for a moment to make a statement that I omitted?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Certainly.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that that is contrary to the rule made by unanimous consent.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I will yield for a question or anything which does not deprive me of the meager privileges which I enjoy.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will take but a moment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the junior Senator from Wisconsin will proceed.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I did neglect to state that this section clothes the Commission with power to make an order upon an investigation which has originated with the Commission. Section 13 of the bill as reported by the committee leaves with the Commission authority to make an investigation upon its own motion, but section 15 does not empower the Commission to make the order to correct a wrong which it may discover upon an investigation under section 13.

Now, section 15, which I propose as a substitute, corrects that obvious defect in the pending bill. That is the only difference with reference to this particular point. It is manifestly absurd to allow the Commission to make an investigation on its own motion under section 13 and then withhold from it all authority to issue an order to remedy the defect or evil which the investigation has disclosed.

Mr. DOLLIVER. What the Senator says is absolutely correct. I have spent a good many hours the past winter in the society of the Interstate Commerce Commission. I will say for them that they appear to be the only people in this town who have a definite and coherent knowledge of the practical aspects of the problems with which we are dealing, and I recognize that fact as thoroughly as my friend from Wisconsin.

I say to the Senate, therefore, that it is not the notion of the Interstate Commerce Commission that there is any need for them to be clothed with the power of originating these complaints. It is their opinion, and I think every practical-minded man will share it, that if we succeed in dealing with all the questions that arise on complaint we will have covered about as large a field as seven able-bodied men will be able to attend to.

I will go further. If the Commission, in making the investigations authorized by section 13, finds itself face to face with a situation that needs correction, there is no difficulty in securing a complaint to correspond with the trouble which they have discovered. That is the view of the subject which they take. So much for that.

Now, the second departure of this substitute from the pending bill is in respect to the maximum rates and minimum rates, and the relation of rates. I have had the opinion that it would be a good thing to put in a section giving the Commission control over the relation of rates, but the more I meditate upon the practical features of the problem the less importance I attach to it. I hold that the command of the high rate, given in section 4 of the pending bill, accomplishes every substantial result that could be obtained by all the other provisions which are contained in the substitute.

I know of no discrimination which is unjust and unlawful, either in rates or classification, that can not be corrected by reducing the rate at its high point, or attaching to the article the rate of the class to which it belongs. If there is a Senator in this Chamber who can give an illustration of a discrimination forbidden by law which can not be corrected by the intelligent exercise of the power over the high rate, I would be glad to suspend a minute to have the illustration given.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I should like to furnish that case, if I may.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Certainly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Exactly such cases are cited by the Interstate Commerce Commission, not alone in one, but in several of their reports. I call your attention to one instance. An attempt was made to regulate the rates between Winona, La Crosse, and Eau Claire and Iowa markets for lumber by fixing a maximum rate. This case occurred under the law of 1887, before the Supreme Court deprived them of power to fix rates. The lumber merchants of Eau Claire were unable to get into the Iowa market as against the lumber merchants of La Crosse and Winona without having the rate changed. They applied to the Interstate Commerce Commission to change the rate. They lowered the rate and fixed a maximum rate, whereupon the railroad companies at once dropped the rate for Winona and La Crosse below the rate fixed for Eau Claire, and continued to exclude the Eau Claire lumber merchants from the Iowa market.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I will say to my honorable friend I am familiar with that case, and I will ask him not to dispose of my time any longer.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Just a moment. The Commission cite that very case as illustrating the necessity of clothing them with power to fix a minimum rate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa declines to yield.

Mr. DOLLIVER. And let me say to my honorable friend, in such case under this bill all in the world that would be necessary is for the Interstate Commerce Commission to make another order, and if the railroads continued the discrimination there certainly would be nothing to prevent the Commission from accepting the challenge.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator from Wisconsin that the Senator from Iowa declines to yield further.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will ask the Senator to yield for just another question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Wisconsin suspend?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is contrary to the spirit of the rule for one Senator to yield his time for debate by another who has occupied the floor in his own right.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask unanimous consent to ask the Senator from Iowa a question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield for a question?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Certainly.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa yields.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I wish to ask the Senator this question: As I understand him, he says the difficulty could be met by simply lowering the maximum rate. Now, is it not true that no matter what maximum rate is fixed, the railroad may still discriminate by lowering the competing rate? If there were authority to fix a minimum rate the railroad could not continue the discrimination.

Mr. DOLLIVER. That is also subject to the order of the Commission, upon complaint, to cease and desist from an unlawful discrimination. I have often heard it said that there are rates at terminal points, like the Missouri River, unreasonably low, and a year ago I shared with my honorable friend the notion that it would be a good thing to give the Commission power to raise the rates, for example, at Omaha. I found certain interior towns that had a disproportionate rate, a rate that was a discrimination as compared with the rate at Omaha, and I yielded a rather enthusiastic assent to the proposition that the true remedy for that was to give the Commission power over the Omaha rate to put it at a minimum or to raise it, finding it too low. But I confess that a year's rather monotonous contact with this question has somewhat altered my views on that. I find that there are six railroads running from Chicago to Omaha, and the first thing I struck was that you can not raise the rate at Omaha for the Illinois Central without raising it for all the other trunk lines unless you exclude the Illinois Central from participation in the Omaha business. Then I said we will raise them all from Chicago to Omaha, and thereupon some practical minded man said to me that there are several railroads running to Omaha from St. Louis and if you raise all the Chicago rates you turn Chicago's Omaha business over to St. Louis. Then I said we will raise the St. Louis rates also, and along came a man who had some practical knowledge of this world, and he said that would result in the turning of the business of Omaha over to Kansas City and St. Joseph. When I got through my researches on the question, I made up my mind that the remedy was rather elaborate to raise the rates upon the consumers of merchandise—some 10,000,000 or 15,000,000 people—who are tributary to these great distributing points for the purpose of correcting a rate in Iowa or Missouri or Wisconsin that was too high.

I say again, there is no discrimination of that kind that can not be corrected by reducing that high rate; and neither the railroad nor the Government could raise these rates at the Missouri terminals without fastening upon the entire community a hardship altogether worse than the thing we set out to remedy. Therefore I say that every discrimination which is unjust and unreasonable in the ordinary sense of those words can be corrected by reducing the rate at the high point.

Early in this session a very interesting group of people came to see me from Oklahoma City. They stated that it cost them 43 cents to get lumber from the Port Arthur region in Texas to Oklahoma City, while the same railroad carried it right through Oklahoma City to Kansas City for 27 cents. That struck me as an intolerable outrage. I discovered that there were lines at Port Arthur carrying the same lumber directly to Kansas City for 27 cents; and this railroad so complained against could not increase that rate at Kansas City without taking itself altogether out of the lumber business there. When I thought upon the propriety of raising the rates from Port Arthur to Kansas City on all the roads, I found that those rates were old and that they had been beaten down to that low point, not by the railroads, but by the competitive forces of the whole market place of the United States, over which the railroads have had little real control. We represented the fight between Wisconsin and Minnesota and Michigan against southern pine for the Kansas City market.

That low rate at Kansas City could not be disturbed either by the railroads or by the Government without inflicting a burden upon millions of people. I therefore made up my mind that the only practicable remedy for the situation of our friends in Oklahoma City was to take up that 43-cent rate and reduce it, if it can be shown that it is unjust and unreasonable. So the suggestion that we ought to control the right of a railroad to reduce rates simply introduces a persuasive phraseology into this bill without adding anything to its efficiency in correcting the abuses which ought to be corrected.

I will say to my honorable friend that that is the view which is shared to-day by the members of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. McLAURIN. I offer an amendment to the amendment, which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi proposes an amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2 of the amendment of Mr. LA FOLLETTE, line 8, it is proposed to strike out the word "both," where it appears after the word "prescribe;" and in the same line to strike out the words "and a minimum;" so as to read:

To fix a differential and to prescribe a maximum rate.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the trouble with the answer which the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] has made to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is that it will not work. He says that the Commission can easily remedy a trouble such as that instanced by the Senator from Wisconsin by still further reducing the rate; but the Senator from Iowa forgets that his own bill commands the Commission to fix a rate that is reasonable and just as a maximum, and when that is done the Commission can not put it any lower. If it does, the railroad goes into court and restrains it as unjust and unreasonable. Therefore the evil can not be corrected in that way.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. DOLLIVER. There is certainly nothing in this bill to prevent the Commission from taking the testimony of the railroad itself with reference to what the proper rate ought to be. If the Commission finds that the railroad is fixing a lower rate, there is room at least to indulge the presumption that the Commission would not be very seriously disturbed by a court of justice if they did such an act as that.

Mr. BAILEY. But the railroad can put its rate as low as it chooses. It can not put it above a fair and just compensation under the common law, but it can put it as low as it chooses; and the Senator from Iowa will not contend that because the railroad chooses to put its rate below a just compensation the Commission can do the same.

Does the Senator from Iowa suppose that under this bill any carrier would be compelled in a court, because it had seen fit to put its rate too low, to dismiss its complaint against the Commission when it could prove that the commission rate was not a just and reasonable one?

Now, Mr. President——

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. DANIEL. Merely for a question.

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. DANIEL. Is it not true that a railroad company has no right in making a low rate at any time to fix it below cost?

Mr. BAILEY. A railroad, unless restrained by a statute, can, and does, transport persons and property for nothing. Its stockholders might go into court and restrain that mismanagement, but the Government would have no power to object.

Mr. DANIEL. I want to call the attention of the Senator from Texas to the fact that the Supreme Court has held that, with reference to a low rate, the company has no right to put the rate below cost, for the reason that it is acting as a trustee.

Mr. BAILEY. That is as to the owners of the stocks and bonds.

Mr. DANIEL. That is true.

Mr. BAILEY. I am not raising that question. I freely concede that what the Senator says is true so far as that is concerned.

Mr. DANIEL. That shows that it is within the power of the Commission to put a limit on the lowness of the rate, because it might be a violation of a public trust.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the philosophy of this whole question is the absolute rate, and this bill proceeds upon that philosophy. In this very bill it is provided that when the carrier publishes its rate it does not publish a maximum rate, but it publishes an absolute rate, and it is not permitted to charge less, even though it charges everybody less. To say that a carrier is compelled to fix an absolute rate, but that the Commission whose duty it is to fix a just and reasonable rate shall only fix a maximum one is a palpable absurdity. The truth is that the President has compromised on this question, as did the Senator from Iowa. I do not say that the present opinion of the Senator from Iowa does not represent his judgment to-day, but it does not represent the judgment of the Senator or of the President or of the Republican party on it when the Esch-Townsend bill was introduced and passed by the House of Representatives a little over two years ago.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the point has been made all through this debate that the Interstate Commerce Commission under this law is not to be given any control over the relation of rates. Now, I wish to ask the Senator how it would be possible to meet just such a case as is suggested by the conditions at Eau Claire, in competition with La Crosse and Winona, and the cases which arise out of the conditions at Kansas City and St. Louis, unless you trench upon the relation of rates? I think that is the hole in this bill, at least it is one of them.

Mr. BAILEY. It is absolutely impossible to correct such an abuse, because if the Commission has already fixed the rates between two points and fixed them at what is just and reasonable, then if it attempted to lower them the Commission would be restrained by the courts.

Mr. President, suppose a railroad has two classes of customers—one producing wheat and the other producing coal. Suppose the Commission fixes a maximum rate on both, and the railroad says to the people who produce coal that it will carry their goods for 80 per cent of the maximum rate, but charges the people who produce wheat the full maximum rate. That is not a discrimination condemned by this bill, and yet no Senator will defend it, because a railroad has no fair right to charge one man a full rate while serving another man for less than full rate. No Senator will defend such a practice in shipping the same commodities from the same point, but this bill permits and encourages it when different commodities are shipped from different points.

I hold that every man in this country is entitled to use the railroads by paying a just compensation for the service which he employs, and the railroads are entitled to receive from every man who uses them a just compensation for the service which they render; but whenever the railroad serves one man for less, in the nature of things it must charge the other man more, because if under the lower charge against some traffic it is earning a return upon the value of its property, a readjustment would permit at least a slight reduction in all charges.

In the case I have instanced, where the produce hauled was coal on one side and wheat on the other, instead of permitting them to charge for carrying wheat 100 per cent of the maximum rate and only 80 per cent of the maximum on coal, we could fix the charge at 90 on both. The amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin does not go as far as I want to go. Instead of adopting the maximum and minimum, I prefer the absolute rate. We have had that in Texas for sixteen years and nobody has ever found any fault with its operation there.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Just to say, in order that my position may not be misunderstood, that I have tried in the amendments which I have suggested to this bill to keep within the recommendations of the Interstate Commerce Commission. I am in favor, as is the Senator from Texas, of clothing the Commission with power to fix an absolute rate, which I think is the only logical basis upon which rates can be regulated.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I am glad to know that the Senator concurs in my view. It is the view adopted by nearly every earnest friend of this legislation. It was the view of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] until within these last twelve months he has become a little confused with the abundance of his learning; but in another twelve months——

Mr. DOLLIVER. That is a trouble from which my friend from Texas is not likely to suffer.

Mr. BAILEY. I would be willing to submit that to everybody who knows the Senator from Iowa and myself. I always know the provisions of any bill which I help to report to this Senate, and the Senator from Iowa——

Mr. DOLLIVER. I know of nothing my honorable friend has not appeared to know during these discussions.

Mr. BAILEY. Your "honorable friend" has pretended to know nothing that he did not know, as the RECORD here will show.

Mr. DOLLIVER. There has been a difference of opinion over there on that.

Mr. BAILEY. Yes; there are differences of opinion over here. It is true that any proposition I might make would be dissented from by some on this side. That is true; but that does not convict me of any error. That is one of the infirmities of mankind; but it is not good taste for the Senator from Iowa, who is not concerned with differences over here, to be talking about them across the aisle.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, I do not know——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I certainly did not introduce this note of disparagement of my colleagues here. I make no pretensions to any particular knowledge of these things, except what I have been able to pick up by sitting up nights during the winter. If I had got hold of as small a point as that which my honorable friend discoursed upon here in the Senate for four hours, I believe I would have had discretion enough to have got rid of it in less than that time.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, when the Senator from Iowa and I first discoursed about that subject, he said he disagreed with me, and after I finished that speech he said he agreed with me. So I did not speak altogether in vain.

Mr. DOLLIVER. If I undertook to agree with everything that my friend said in that four hours, I would have been in a bewildered condition.

Mr. BAILEY. That is the Senator's usual condition. [Laughter.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN] to the amendment in the nature of a substitute proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

Mr. MCLAURIN. Mr. President, I have been asked by a Senator sitting near me to state what is the effect of that amendment. The purpose I had in offering it was to strike out the power of the Commission to fix a minimum rate. I do not want to discuss it. I am opposed to the fixing of a minimum rate, and I have offered an amendment to the amendment which I think, if adopted, will strike out the power of the Commission to fix a minimum rate. That is the purpose of the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN] to the amendment in the nature of a substitute proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. [Putting the question.] By the sound the "noes" have it.

Mr. MCLAURIN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Several SENATORS. No, no.

Mr. MCLAURIN. Then, I ask for a division, Mr. President.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 18, noes 46.

So Mr. MCLAURIN'S amendment to the amendment of Mr. LA FOLLETTE was rejected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the amendment in the nature of a substitute proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the next section.

The Secretary proceeded to read section 5.

Mr. CULBERSON. I should like to ask if it is in order to offer an amendment at this time?

Mr. CULLOM. Has the reading of the section been completed?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It has not been. An amendment is not in order until the reading of the section is completed.

Mr. CULLOM. So I supposed.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of section 5, as follows:

SEC. 5. That section 16 of said act, as amended March 2, 1889, be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 16. That if, after hearing on a complaint made as provided in section 13 of this act, the Commission shall determine that any party complainant is entitled to an award of damages under the provisions of this act for a violation thereof, the Commission shall make an order directing the carrier to pay to the complainant the sum to which he is entitled on or before a day named.

"If a carrier does not comply with an order for the payment of money within the time limit in such order, the complainant, or any person for whose benefit such order was made, may file in the circuit court of the United States for the district in which he resides or in which is located the principal operating office of the carrier, or through which the road of the carrier runs, a petition setting forth briefly the causes for which he claims damages, and the order of the Commission in the premises. Such suit shall proceed in all respects like other civil suits for damages, except that on the trial of such suit the findings and order of the Commission shall be prima facie evidence of the facts therein stated, and except that the petitioner shall not be liable for costs in the circuit court nor for costs at any subsequent stage of the proceedings unless they accrue upon his appeal. If the petitioner shall finally prevail he shall be allowed a reasonable attorney's fee, to be taxed and collected as a part of the costs of the suit. All complaints for the recovery of damages shall be filed with the Commission within two years from the time the cause of action accrues, and not after, and a petition for the enforcement of an order for the payment of money shall be filed in the circuit court within one year from the date of the order, and not after.

"In such suits all parties in whose favor the Commission may have made an award for damages by a single order may be joined as plaintiffs, and all of the carriers parties to such order awarding such damages may be joined as defendants, and such suit may be maintained by such joint plaintiffs and against such joint defendants in any district where any one of such joint plaintiffs could maintain such suit against any one of such joint defendants; and service of process against any one of such defendants as may not be found in the district where the suit is brought may be made in any district where such defendant carrier has its principal operating office. In case of such joint suit the recovery, if any, may be by judgment in favor of any one of such plaintiffs, against the defendant found to be liable to such plaintiff.

"Every order of the Commission shall be forthwith served by mailing to any one of the principal officers or agents of the carrier at his usual place of business a copy thereof; and the registry mail receipt shall be prima facie evidence of the receipt of such order by the carrier in due course of mail.

"The Commission shall be authorized to suspend or modify its orders upon such notice and in such manner as it shall deem proper, and the orders of the Commission shall take effect at the end of thirty days after notice thereof to the carriers directed to obey the same, unless such orders shall have been suspended or modified by the Commission or suspended or set aside by the order or decree of a court of competent jurisdiction: Provided, however, That the Commission, for good cause shown, may extend the time in which such order shall take effect.

"It shall be the duty of every common carrier, its agents and employees, to observe and comply with such orders so long as the same shall remain in effect.

"Any carrier, any officer, representative, or agent of a carrier, or any receiver, trustee, lessee, or agent of either of them, who knowingly fails or neglects to obey any order made under the provisions of section 15 of this act, shall forfeit to the United States the sum of $5,000 for each offense. Every distinct violation shall be a separate offense, and in case of a continuing violation each day shall be deemed a separate offense.

"The forfeiture provided for in this act shall be payable into the Treasury of the United States, and shall be recoverable in a civil suit in the name of the United States, brought in the district where the carrier has its principal operating office, or in any district through which the road of the carrier runs.

"It shall be the duty of the various district attorneys, under the direction of the Attorney-General of the United States, to prosecute for the recovery of forfeitures. The costs and expenses of such prosecution shall be paid out of the appropriation for the expenses of the courts of the United States. The Commission may, with the consent of the Attorney-General, employ special counsel in any proceeding under this act, paying the expenses of such employment out of its own appropriation.

"If any carrier fails or neglects to obey any order of the Commission, other than for the payment of money, while the same is in effect, any party injured thereby, or the Commission in its own name, may apply to the circuit court in the district where such carrier has its principal operating office, or in which the violation or disobedience of such order shall happen, for an enforcement of such order. Such application shall be by petition, which shall state the substance of the order and the respect in which the carrier has failed of obedience, and shall be served upon the carrier in such manner as the court may direct, and the court shall prosecute such inquiries and make such investigations, through such means as it shall deem needful in the ascertainment of the facts at issue or which may arise upon the hearing of such petition. If, upon such hearing as the court may determine to be necessary, it appears that the order was regularly made and duly served, and that the carrier is in disobedience of the same, the court shall enforce obedience to such order by a writ of injunction, or other proper process, mandatory or otherwise, to restrain such carrier, its officers, agents, or representatives, from further disobedience of such order, or to enjoin upon it, or them, obedience to the same; and in the enforcement of such process the court shall have those powers ordinarily exercised by it in compelling obedience to its writs of injunction and mandamus.

"From any action upon such petition an appeal shall lie by either party to the Supreme Court of the United States, and in such court the case shall have priority in hearing and determination over all other causes except criminal causes, but such appeal shall not vacate or suspend the order appealed from.

"The venue of suits brought in any of the circuit courts of the United States to enjoin, set aside, annul, or suspend any order or requirement of the Commission shall be in the district where the carrier against whom such order or requirement may have been made has its principal operating office. The provisions of 'An act to expedite the hearing and determination of suits in equity, and so forth,' approved February 11, 1903, shall be, and are hereby, made applicable to all such suits, and are also made applicable to any proceeding in equity to enforce any order or requirement of the Commission, or any of the provisions of the act to regulate commerce approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto. It shall be the duty of the Attorney-General in every such case to file the certificate provided for in said expediting act of February 11, 1903, as necessary to the application of the provisions thereof, and upon appeal as therein authorized to the Supreme Court of the United States, the case shall have in such court priority in hearing and determination over all other causes except criminal causes.

"The copies of schedules and tariffs of rates, fares, and charges, and of all contracts, agreements, or arrangements between common carriers filed with the Commission as herein provided, and the statistics, tables, and figures contained in the annual reports of carriers made to the Commission, as required by the provisions of this act, shall be preserved as public records in the custody of the secretary of the Commission, and shall be received as prima facie evidence of what they purport to be for the purpose of investigations by the Commission and in all judicial proceedings; and copies of or extracts from any of said schedules, tariffs, contracts, agreements, arrangements, or reports made public records as aforesaid, certified by the secretary under its seal, shall be received in evidence with like effect as the originals."

Mr. CULLOM. I offer an amendment on behalf of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], who was compelled to return to his home.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 14, line 20, after the word "proper," it is proposed to insert a period and to strike out the remainder of line 20 and all down to and including the word "effect," in line 2, on page 15.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

Mr. TILLMAN. We have been working here now nearly seven hours, and a good many Senators have asked me to move that the Senate adjourn. I do not think we will expedite matters by considering these amendments to-night, and I therefore move——

Mr. KEAN. Let these amendments be read.

Mr. ALDRICH. I will ask the Senator from South Carolina to allow me to make a request. I ask that the first four sections of this bill may be reprinted and be here in the morning, with the amendments already adopted by the Senate.

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly; I will be glad to have it.

Mr. SPOONER. Indicating the amendments.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request for reprinting made by the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. GALLINGER. If there are amendments which have been offered and not acted upon, let them be printed in brackets and small capitals.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope we may act upon the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Rhode Island? The Chair hears none. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 17, line 11, after the words "United States," it is proposed to insert "against the Commission."

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. ALDRICH. Let the Senator offer his other amendment.

Mr. CULLOM. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. On page 17, line 14, after the word "office," insert the following:

And if the order or requirement has been made against two or more carriers then in the district where any one of said carriers has its principal operating office, and if the carrier has its principal operating office in the District of Columbia then the venue shall be in the district where said carrier has its principal office; and jurisdiction to hear and determine such suits is hereby vested in such courts.

Mr. TILLMAN. I want to offer a substitute for that in the morning, and I therefore insist either on an executive session or adjournment.

Mr. RAYNER. I will offer an amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. RAYNER. I have already proposed an amendment, but I want to change it and offer this in lieu of the amendment I proposed and have it printed. I just propose the amendment.

Mr. TILLMAN. I want an adjournment or an executive session; I do not care which.

Mr. CULLOM (to Mr. TILLMAN). Move that we adjourn.

Mr. RAYNER. I understand that my amendment is to be printed along with the rest.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be printed.

Mr. TILLMAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from South Carolina withhold the motion for a moment?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

ESTATE OF ALFRED SWEARINGIN, DECEASED.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate, on behalf of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY], a proposed order, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Ordered, That the Committee on Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 3355) for the relief of the estate of Alfred Swearingin, deceased, and that the Secretary of the Senate be directed to transmit the papers accompanying the same to the Court of Claims in accordance with the request.

Mr. FULTON. I object to the present consideration of the order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under objection, the order will lie over.

Mr. TILLMAN. I renew the motion that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 51 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, May 12, 1906, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, May 11, 1906.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that when the House adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York that when the House adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

SEIZURE OF SCHOONER LIZZIE B. ADAMS.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to report the House resolution 420, with certain amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to, and that the resolution as agreed to be adopted.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution, with the amendments.

House resolution No. 420.

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and hereby is, requested to inform the House of Representatives, if not incompatible with the public interest, what information, if any, is in possession of the Department of State in regard to the reported arrest of the crew of the American schooner Lizzie B. Adams by the authorities of the Republic of Mexico.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I move that the resolution as amended be adopted. Before that question is put, I would like to state, for the information of those who are interested in the matter of the seizure of these vessels in Mexican waters, that the committee has been informed that the State Department has taken the matter up, and our ambassador at Mexico has been instructed to look into the matter; that under the date of the 22d of April a letter has been received from our consul at Progreso, in which he states that he has the matter in charge, and that American interests are being safeguarded.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken; and the resolution as amended was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on striking out the preamble.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to move to correct the Journal of Wednesday, May 9. I am recorded among those not voting. The fact is I was present and distinctly answered "present" on the first call of the roll.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman desires to correct the Journal of Wednesday, the Chair will state that it would require a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Journal of that day was approved.

Mr. WANGER. Then, Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider that vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to reconsider the vote by which the Journal of Wednesday, May 9, 1906, was approved.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Speaker, I now move to correct the Journal as indicated.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to correct the Journal of Wednesday, May 9, 1906, as indicated.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the approval of the Journal as amended.

The question was taken; and the Journal as amended was approved.

PENSION BILLS.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that bills on the Private Calendar in order for to-day may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I shall be compelled to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi objects.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar in order for to-day.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar, Mr. CAPRON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be considered as agreed to and——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. Is there any motion pending before the Chair? If there is, by whom is it made?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Has any motion been made; and if so, by whom?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair considers the motion is made by the gentleman from New Hampshire.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that the rules provide for a method of making a motion to the Chair. Some gentleman must rise in his place and make the motion. It is not sufficient merely to send anything to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair considers that the gentleman from Mississippi is technically correct. Therefore the gentleman from New Hampshire——

Mr. SULLOWAY. I was unable to hear what the gentleman from Mississippi stated.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is made by the gentleman from Mississippi that there has been no motion for the adoption of the amendment. The bill before the committee has an amendment.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Well, I move the adoption of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Hampshire moves that the committee amendment be adopted.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I beg the Chair's pardon, but there is no procedure in the rules of the House of Representatives, so far as I know, which enables the Chair to just declare a bill laid aside with a favorable recommendation without consulting the House of Representatives by vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has constructively consulted the Committee of the Whole upon each of the bills so far presented by the present occupant of the chair.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I beg the Chair's pardon, but a moment ago the Clerk read a bill, or the title of it, and immediately afterwards it was laid aside with a favorable recommendation. There was no intervening consultation of the House at all, nor the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say that probably the gentleman from Mississippi was not giving proper attention to the words of the Chair to the committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, if that is the case, "the gentleman from Mississippi" withdraws the parliamentary inquiry and apologizes for making it. But "the gentleman from Mississippi" understood that to be the procedure of the Chair. He also understood, a moment ago, the Clerk read one bill after another without any intervention of the Chair himself. I may have been mistaken in that. If I was, I regret it, and hope it will not be repeated if it was.

The CHAIRMAN. If it should have occurred, the Chair will be very careful that the rules of the House are preserved. The Chair desires to state that, without objection, the procedure will continue as it has been. The Clerk will report the next bill.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bills and amendments to the House with a recommendation that the amendments be agreed to, and that the bills—some with and some without amendments—do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CAPRON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House, reported that the Committee had had under consideration bills on the Private Calendar and directed him to report the same—some with and some without amendments—with a recommendation that the amendments be agreed to, and the bills as amended do pass.

THOMAS GARRATT.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 18236) granting an increase of pension to Thomas Garrett, reported from the Committee of the Whole with the following amendments:

In line 6 strike out the word "Garrett" and insert in lieu thereof the word "Garratt."

In same line strike out the word "First" and insert in lieu thereof the word "Sixteenth."

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CAPRON). The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Did the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] address the Chair?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did address the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. But the gentleman addressed the Chair while sitting in his place.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman now addresses the Chair while standing, and while the gentleman does that he would like to remind the Chair of the fact that the Chair has been recognizing an imaginary Member who must have been sitting for about a half hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks that the gentleman from Mississippi is too modest when he calls himself an imaginary Member.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But it is not this real Member, but some imaginary Member who has been making imaginary motions to the Chair, and which the Chair has been in imagination entertaining now for about a half hour. Now, then, I call for a division upon the amendments to the pending bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Upon the motion to adopt the committee amendments, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] demands a division.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the Chair kindly inform us what the amendments are?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendments.

The amendments were again read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 67, noes 11.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, no quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi makes the point of order that there is no quorum, and the Chair will count.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman did not make a point of order, but simply in an interlocutory way suggested to the Chair that there was no quorum, and made no point—in an imaginary way, I would say.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] has proceeded in a parliamentary way. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Mississippi if he will withhold his point of order to receive a message from the Senate?

Mr. WILLIAMS. In a moment. I merely want to remind the Chair of the singular absence of information about the word "interlocutory" existing in the mind of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL]. The exact language of "the gentleman from Mississippi" was, "I make the point of order that there is no quorum present." I would advise the gentleman to get his Connecticut in range with his English.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I simply suggest that the gentleman did not make the remark that he made the point of order. He simply said, "No quorum."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Mississippi renew his point of order?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I just held it in abeyance while the report was being made. It has never been withdrawn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will count. [After counting.] There is a quorum present, the Chair having found 198 Members by actual count; and the amendment is agreed to.

The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out "thirty" and insert "twenty-four."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended as recommended by the committee.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 6101. An act for the relief of the estate of Charles M. Demarest, deceased.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendment bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 17576. An act to provide for the entry of agricultural lands within forest reserves.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 395) concerning foreign-built dredges.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 6003. An act to construct and place a steel light vessel on Swiftsure Bank, off the entrance of Juan de Fuca Strait;
S. 5512. An act defining the qualifications of jurors for service in the United States district court in Porto Rico; and
S. 6129. An act to amend section 4472 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the carrying of dangerous articles on passenger steamers.

The message also announced that the Vice-President had appointed Mr. PETTUS and Mr. GALLINGER members of the joint committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the Executive Departments," for the disposition of useless papers in the Post-Office Department.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, no quorum!

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count.

Mr. CANDLER (during the count). Mr. Speaker, is there a quorum here?

The SPEAKER. There will be.

Mr. CANDLER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. CANDLER. I call for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 161, noes 11.

Mr. CANDLER. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Ossa has been piled on Pelion, and there are no more mountains to pile. [Great laughter.] One hundred and ninety-two gentlemen are present; the ayes have it, and the motion is agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. CRUMPACKER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the naval appropriation bill. When the committee rose yesterday evening a point of order was pending to the paragraph of the bill on page 33, which the Clerk will report.

Steel floating dry dock: Steel floating dry dock (to cost $1,250,000), $100,000.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, as I am compelled to leave the House very shortly, the gentleman who made the point of order, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY], kindly consented that I might be heard first in opposition to it.

Mr. MUDD. Just a moment, if I may interrupt the gentleman. Do I understand that the point of order is that it is not authorized by law?

Mr. OLMSTED. I understand that to be the point of order.

Mr. Chairman, while it was not definitely stated, I understand the point of order is based upon the second clause of Rule XXI of this House, which provides:

No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress; nor shall any provision changing existing law be in order in any general appropriation bill or in any amendment thereto.

That is a time-honored rule, and one whose usefulness and importance ought not to be frittered away or impaired by construction. On the other hand, it ought not, by too rigid construction, be converted into an engine of evil and inconvenience to the House rather than an instrument of usefulness. These rules relating to our procedure in the House may be compared, in a sense, to the Constitution, the organic law of the Government.

I need not say to a lawyer so well versed as the present occupant of the chair that when it is alleged that an act of the assembly is in conflict with a constitutional provision, every doubt is resolved in favor of the statute. So I submit for your consideration the proposition that when a rule is invoked against a paragraph in a bill reported by a committee, in a clear case of doubt it should be resolved in favor of the regularity of the proposed measure.

Now, it is quite probable that there will not be found a precedent upon this precise case, and we shall have to reason from the rule itself, the mischief which it was intended to remedy, and to consider analogous cases which have been passed upon by Chairmen and Speakers and by the House in Committee of the Whole. Now, it is important at the outset to consider the exception to this rule in favor of such public works and objects as are already in progress. And I shall endeavor to show that this particular paragraph is within that exception.

It is not pretended that this floating dry dock itself is in course of construction or is in progress, but that the United States Navy is a work in progress, a Government object, and that this dry dock is in continuation thereof and in maintenance of that Navy.

First, let us consider for a moment what a floating dry dock is. Upon that point you will be more fully enlightened by the members of the Committee on Naval Affairs, who are much better informed than myself; but I understand, in a general way, that it is not local, it is not stationary, it is not attached to the land. It floats upon the navigable waters of the United States. Its usefulness consists in enabling vessels of the Navy to be repaired at sea. There are many of the navy-yards which our largest vessels can not enter, by reason of the great amount of water that they draw. A floating dock of this character is taken out to the vessel, it is sunk under the vessel, and then it rises up and brings the vessel with it, so that the vessel may be repaired out there in the water. It is an exceedingly important adjunct of the Navy, just as much an essential and standing much in the same line as the colliers which supply the coal to our men-of-war. You will find nowhere any express authority of law for the construction of the torpedo boats, the torpedo-boat destroyers, the colliers, and many of the other things that are appropriated for in this bill. We find, for instance, appropriated for in this bill not only torpedo boats and torpedo-boat destroyers and submarine boats and a battle ship, but also rifles, revolvers, cartridges, bayonets, swords, drums, etc., the repair of tents, postage stamps, the making of parade grounds, and all that class of appropriations which are found in every naval appropriation bill. In fact, this bill covers appropriations for everything pertaining to the Navy from a 2-cent postage stamp to a $6,000,000 battle ship. There are very few items in it for which there can be found specific statutory authority, but they are all part of the naval establishment. They are there in continuation of the United States Navy or for the maintenance thereof. Now, that question has been distinctly passed upon by this committee and by previous Chairmen.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. OLMSTED. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman mean to state that there is no statute permitting the purchase of ammunition, but that we simply carry that along year after year in the appropriation bill?

Mr. OLMSTED. I know of no express statute which mentions ammunition or guns or any one of a dozen of things appropriated for in this bill. There is, I think, a general statute providing for the manner in which the Secretary of the Navy shall purchase supplies, and some of these items may be covered by that; but for more than half the vessels in the Navy there is no statutory provision at all. They were simply appropriated for in appropriation bills.

Now, that point was passed upon long ago. At least as early as February 6, 1887, there was offered an amendment to a naval appropriation bill for the purchase of two swift, double-bottomed steel cruisers, and this very point of order was made against it by William S. Holman, of Indiana. The point was decided, after elaborate consideration and discussion, by JAMES B. MCCREARY, of Kentucky, then in the chair. He said:

If the work be a public work, or if the object is a public object, and it is already in progress, then there need not be any previous legislation authorizing it. The Chair believes that the construction of the Navy is a public object or a public work, and the language of the bill which we have been considering, and the appropriation made at the last session, show that the construction of the Navy is in progress.

Not of those two particular steel cruisers, but of the Navy.

It is very agreeable to the present occupant of the chair to be able to refer to a precedent.

I will not stop to read the precedent, but it was a decision made in the Forty-sixth Congress by Mr. Carlisle, also of Kentucky, then in the chair, in which he held that the word "objects," as used in the rule, meant something in addition to the word "works," and must be held to include, among other things, the naval establishment recognized by law and supported by the Government.

Chairman MCCREARY then said, and you will find it in paragraph 487 of the Parliamentary Precedents:

The Government has undertaken to maintain, and is annually maintaining, a naval establishment, and under the rule appropriations may be made for it in a general appropriation bill, and such has always been the practice until last session, when appropriations for the construction of ships for the Navy and armaments for them were made in a separate bill. Before the last session such appropriations were made in the naval appropriation bill under the rule exactly as it now is.

There is no law prescribing the number of ships that shall constitute the Navy or the number of guns they shall carry. Those matters depend entirely on the amount of money appropriated for those purposes, just as the number of clerks and other employees in the Departments depend upon the appropriations made. * * * This decision allows an important amendment to be offered, but it gives to the Committee of the Whole the right to pass upon this interesting question and an opportunity to say whether it is in favor of increasing the Navy or not.

Mr. PERKINS. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. OLMSTED. Certainly.

Mr. PERKINS. Would the gentleman think an appropriation for a new navy-yard was subject to a point of order?

Mr. OLMSTED. I think an appropriation for a new navy-yard would be subject to a point of order.

Mr. PERKINS. Why, under the gentleman's argument?

Mr. OLMSTED. Because it is not a part of the Navy. It is not a part of the naval establishment.

Mr. PERKINS. Why not, just as much as a new dry dock?

Mr. OLMSTED. That reasoning would extend to the ownership of the coal mine, to the mining of coal, to the quarrying of limestone and the iron ore and the manufacture of pig iron, and so on through all the processes until it reached the machinery in the navy-yard and it was made into something else.

Mr. PERKINS. The argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania goes too far.

Mr. OLMSTED. Not mine, but the argument of the gentleman from New York goes too far.

Mr. DALZELL. Does not the gentleman from Pennsylvania think that there is a difference between an appropriation for a dry dock and an appropriation for a floating dock?

Mr. OLMSTED. I think there is a wide difference; that is what I am coming to. A navy-yard must be on the land, must be attached to the land upon a site, and the Government must first acquire a site. Under the rules and under the precedents the Government must first take some steps to acquire a site by proper legislation before the work can be said to be in progress.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is not a floating dock a floating workshop, and isn't the navy-yard a place on land where the workshop is?

Mr. OLMSTED. A yard necessarily implies land, and a floating dry dock necessarily implies no attachment to the land, but a floating upon the water, and the site is already acquired by the Government.

Mr. PERKINS. Does the Government own the seas?

Mr. OLMSTED. The Government has, as the gentleman knows, entire control of the waters of the sea for a marine league, and beyond that it has just as good a right as anybody else and does not have to ask permission of anybody or get an act of Congress. Now, this decision has been carried further than that, as you will see on page 488 of the Parliamentary Precedents. It has been held that under this rule an act for the authorization of additional seamen for the Navy was in continuation of a public work. That is going a good deal further than the decision as to the ship itself.

Joseph D. Sayers, of Texas, made the point of order against an item which reads thus:

As many additional seamen as in his discretion he may deem necessary, not to exceed 2,000.

He made the point of order that the employment of these seamen was not authorized by law. It was found that there was no statute authorizing their employment, and upon that point Joseph H. O'Neil, of Massachusetts, in the chair, said:

The rulings which have been made from time to time on points of order raised on the naval appropriation bill have established a pretty clear line of precedents; and whatever may have been the opinion or feeling of the Chair on the original proposition, yet, in pursuance of the practice of the House, he feels bound to follow the precedent established by previous presiding officers. So that when a provision was offered to a bill providing for an additional ship to the Navy, notwithstanding the fact that it added to the Navy and increased the expenditure, it has been uniformly held that it was in continuation of existing works or objects already in progress, and was not subject to the point of order.

Without reading the whole of it, he concludes thus:

Now, it would seem to the Chair that under the rulings which have been made it is entirely competent for the committee to bring in a provision in continuation of any public work or object already in progress; that when it is admitted, as it has been by the practice of the House, that it is competent to bring in a provision authorizing the construction of a new ship it carries with it also—

I call attention, Mr. Chairman, now to this language:

It carries with it also the right to maintain that ship, or to continue and maintain work already in progress. This seems to the Chair to be very clear, and after giving a great deal of consideration to the question he is obliged to overrule the point of order.

That is to say, the Chairman ruled that it was in order to appropriate a sum of money to maintain a ship without previous authority of law. This appropriation is for the maintenance of the Navy. It is just as important to repair a disabled battle ship as it is to have men to operate the ship.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. OLMSTED. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Is it not a fact that naval vessels are repaired at navy-yards?

Mr. BATES. Not always.

Mr. DALZELL. Not always.

Mr. TAWNEY. Such repairs as necessitate the use of a dry dock are made invariably and always at a navy-yard, are they not?

Mr. DALZELL. Oh, no.

Mr. OLMSTED. Not invariably and always, because we have a number of floating dry docks.

Mr. TAWNEY. How many?

Mr. OLMSTED. We have a very prominent instance of one now on the broad sea, on its way to Subig Harbor.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. We have one at Algiers and one at Habana and one at Guantanamo.

Mr. OLMSTED. And we have appropriated for two already in this bill in the portion that has passed. I do not think they are always repaired in navy-yards. They are repaired wherever they can be repaired, but there is certainly no provision of law requiring them to be repaired in a navy-yard, and there are navy-yards in which I am told there is not sufficient depth of water to permit our largest vessels to enter. Therefore a vessel might have to be taken a hundred miles away to another yard, and thus delay would occur which might involve great danger to the whole country, whereas with these floating docks they could go out to the vessel, and it might be repaired with great promptness and could get into service very quickly.

I call attention to the fact that the decision made by Mr. O'Neill, of Massachusetts, to which I referred, does not rest entirely upon itself, but, Mr. Sayers having appealed, the decision was sustained by a vote of 143 ayes to 37 nays; so it was the decision of this House in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union that an appropriation for the maintenance of the Navy is in order, although not previously covered by authority of law. I find in section 489 a ruling by Samuel S. Cox, of New York, then in the chair, that a new building, the construction of a fireproof building, on the site of the public grounds at West Point was within the purview of the rule—that is, within that exception—that the construction of a building is an incident to the maintenance of the academy iself, the object being already in progress, the main object contemplated not only by the bill but by the very institution of the academy itself. Now, if that fireproof building was necessary to the maintenance of the academy, how much more is this floating dry dock and kindred structures necessary to the maintenance of the Navy, and therefore strictly within all three of the rulings to which I have referred. Again, in 1898, Mr. MUDD, of Maryland, offered an amendment to the naval appropriation bill authorizing the erection of such new buildings at the Naval Academy at Annapolis as the Secretary of the Navy might consider necessary, and by Mr. SHERMAN, of New York, then in the chair, that was sustained. Then I find that on March 2, 1892, Mr. James D. Richardson, of Tennessee, afterwards chosen by the minority as its candidate for Speaker of this House, sustained a provision for the erection and completion of suitable building at the United States reform school farm in the District, to be used as a reform school for girls, in the course of which he referred to the decisions to which I have referred, made by Mr. MCCREARY and Mr. Cox, and he said in the case decided by the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. MCCREARY, that was for the construction of a naval war college built upon property owned by the Government, and in that case the Chair held it was an appropriation for works already in progress—that the Government owned the property and was bound to maintain that property and that institution. So we are bound to maintain the Navy, and in maintaining the Navy we are continuing a Government work or object already in progress. And Mr. Richardson further said that the Government was bound to maintain the institutions referred to in former cases, and in this case the Government was not certainly in any way bound to maintain either a boy's reform school or this school, and having thus reasoned he submitted the proposition to the Committee of the Whole, and by a vote of 27 yeas to 72 nays the committee overruled the point of order. So that twice at least the House itself in Committee of the Whole has overruled points of order which I contend are in keeping with the point that is now under discussion.

It is true, and no doubt attention will be called to the fact, that in the Fifty-first Congress a provision for a site for a navy-yard and dry dock at or near the lands bought by the United States for a naval depot at Algiers was ruled out and another one for a timber dry dock at Algiers upon the ground that no previous appropriations had been made for the purchase of the land as a site or the erection of a structure upon such site. But here we need no such thing as a site. As I have already stated, this improvement is not to be made on land; it is not to be attached to the land, but it floats upon the navigable waters, just the same as the war vessels of the Navy, just the same as the lifeboats that are carried on every war ship, and just the same as the colliers which carry along the coal or take the coal to our fleets.

Mr. JOHNSON. Where will the dry dock be built?

Mr. OLMSTED. That does not matter. The dry dock will not be built at sea, and neither will the battle ship provided for in this bill be built at sea, and the battle ships and the cruisers which have been ruled in order heretofore have not been built at sea. It does not matter where they are built, but where they are to be used and for what purpose. If they are in continuation of the Navy and for the maintenance of the Navy, then under all of these rulings I have cited the provision is in order.

Why, it has been held that the continuation of special facilities for mail service on trunk lines was a continuation of work in progress and a maintenance of that service, and points of order against it were ruled out, ruled out by Mr. Newton C. Blanchard, of Louisiana, then in this chair, as appears in section 500 of Parliamentary Precedents, and an appeal having been taken from the decision of the Chair, the Chair was sustained by a vote of 98 ayes to 23 noes. I find that a similar point was similarly decided by Mr. PAYNE, of New York, on the 10th of March, 1896. Now, I find another precedent here, to which it seems desirable to call the attention of the Chair. On May 4, 1900, as will appear on page 5172 of the RECORD, there was offered a provision—

For all necessary employees to man and equip the vessels of the Coast and Geodetic Survey to execute the work of the Survey herein provided for and authorized by law, etc.

And the point of order was made against that that there was no authority for it, but the present Speaker of the House opposed that point of order successfully, and my present colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] overruled the point of order upon the ground that the vessels belonged to the Government and that it was the duty and the right of the Government to maintain them by providing the necessary men and the procurement of the necessary equipment, and that therefore the paragraph appropriating for that purpose was not subject to the point of order, it being fairly construed as within the exception and was in continuation of public work already in progress. And on the opposite page I find that this paragraph was objected to:

For the construction of a bridge across Rock Creek on the line of the roadway from Quarry road entrance, etc., $22,000.

The point of order was made against it by Mr. BANKHEAD, and the present distinguished, popular, and young Speaker of this House made this argument, which I think is right in point. He said:

Of course there is no law in specific words, letters, and punctuation authorizing the construction of this bridge, but there is a law creating the Zoological Park; and the Lord has put a stream of water through the park, and the park is thrown open to the public, and there has been a bridge there, but it has rotted down. There is no law to authorize the buying of an elephant, or of a boa constrictor, or a white bear, or a bull pup; but as we have created the Zoological Park by law, and as it is now in esse, we can, without express law, improve the roads, build fences and bridges, and do anything necessary to carry on this magnificent park for the amusement of the boys and girls on Sunday.

The Chairman [Mr. DALZELL] said:

The Chair has no doubt that this appropriation is in continuation of a public work already begun, and is not subject to the point of order.

The Government had the property; it was the duty of the Government to maintain it, even at the expense of building a new bridge. Here the Government has a navy. It is the duty of the Government to maintain it even at the expense of building a dry dock, and if the appropriation in one instance is in order, upon what reasoning can it be found not to be in order to-day? I might cite many other authorities, but they are all to the same effect. This case is not ruled by the two decisions on dry docks and navy-yards. Of course an appropriation for a navy-yard is subject to a point of order if the Government has not provided for a site or done anything for it. Nobody pretends that is part of the Navy any more than an ore mine from which ore is obtained which goes into the guns that finally go on the ships of the Navy. It may be used incidentally for the advantage of the Navy, but this floating dry dock is a part of the Navy established upon the water, and I submit that a fair construction of this rule and of the important exceptions to the rule warrants the overruling of this point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, the argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has proceeded upon a point of order which I reserved to this paragraph last evening at the close of the session. My purpose in reserving the point of order was to ask the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs several questions before making the point of order and discussing the point. However, since the gentleman from Pennsylvania has argued the point of order, I will now make it——

Mr. OLMSTED. The gentleman will understand I do not insist upon his making the point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. Oh, you do not insist upon my making it? Well, I will make it, just the same. The provision itself is the best evidence of the fact that it is not in order. It is a provision for a steel floating dry dock, to cost $1,250,000, and appropriates $100,000 to begin, I presume, the construction of the work. The gentleman says that this steel dry dock is a necessary part of the naval establishment. There is not a line in that paragraph to indicate that this dry dock is to be a part of the naval establishment. There is not a line in this paragraph to indicate that the dry dock is to be used in connection with the repair of a naval vessel or to be used by the Navy Department at all. It is nothing but a steel dry dock, to cost $1,250,000, for the beginning of the construction of which $100,000 is appropriated. So far as the use of the dry dock is concerned, it may be for the use of private commerce for aught that this House knows from the reading of the paragraph itself.

Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. POWERS. Is there anything in the bill to show that a dry dock is needed or called for by the Navy Department?

Mr. TAWNEY. There is nothing in the bill to indicate that a dry dock is necessary in connection with the maintenance of our present naval establishment. There is, however, Mr. Chairman, in the hearings, some statement made by the representatives of the Navy Department, who favor the construction of a steel dry dock at Solomons Island, in Chesapeake Bay, which the Secretary of the Navy states ought to be built, and where he says there ought to be established and maintained a naval station. This, therefore, means the beginning of the authority for the construction and maintenance of another navy-yard.

I understand that Solomons Island is peculiarly well located for the establishment and maintenance of a navy-yard; that they have there abreast of the shore a stage of water equaling 40 feet, sufficient to float any naval vessel to-day on the sea or any floating dry dock that may be necessary in connection with the Navy. But the influence of Solomons Island in the past has not been sufficiently strong to secure the establishment of a navy-yard at that point. The navy-yards have been established elsewhere on the Atlantic coast, where the influence was stronger in favor of their establishment, although the location was not as admirable for it, perhaps, as at Solomons Island. Now, this proposed floating dry dock, so far as the paragraph is concerned, which is the only thing that is before the House officially, does not appear to be even a part of the naval establishment or incident to or necessary for the naval establishment of this country. But, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. OLMSTED. May I ask a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. Certainly.

Mr. OLMSTED. The gentleman will not contend that the passage of the bill with this paragraph in it will authorize the establishment of a navy-yard at Solomons Island?

Mr. TAWNEY. No; it would not authorize the establishment of a navy-yard at Solomons Island; I grant you that. But it is in the minds of those who are behind this proposed appropriation for a steel dry dock to be located and constructed at Solomons Island. And if the Navy Department has been able to convince the committee of the necessity of the establishment of a steel dry dock where we do not have a navy-yard, where naval vessels can not be repaired except in a navy-yard, it is but reasonable to suppose that when they get the steel dry dock the Department will be able to convince the committee then of the necessity for the construction of a navy-yard in order to use the dry dock.

We have a great many dry docks. I am informed that we have a dry dock practically at every navy-yard on the Atlantic coast. We have dry docks of sufficient capacity to accommodate all of the naval vessels that have heretofore been constructed or are now authorized. There is not a scintilla of evidence presented to indicate the necessity for another floating dry dock, unless it be inferred that when this dry dock is completed it will be towed off to some other country or some distant island possession for the accommodation of our Navy in that part of our country. The question, Mr. Chairman, when you get at the facts, assuming that this is a dry dock to be used in connection with the Navy, which fact must be assumed, because there is nothing in the bill to indicate it; but assuming it is a floating dry dock to be used in connection with the repair of vessels, then it comes within a number of precedents.

Every decision that has been made by a Chairman of the Committee of the Whole on this question relating to the appropriation of money for a dry dock not authorized by law has been in favor of the point of order holding that the provision was not in order. I have here a series of precedents in House document, volume 80, of Parliamentary Precedents, page 285. The head note is this:

The construction of a new dry dock for the Navy, except where specially authorized by law, has been held not to be the continuation of a public work within the meaning of the rule.

And the rule referred to is the rule which I invoke against this provision—clause 2 of Rule XXI.

On April 10, 1890, the House was in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, considering the naval appropriation bill. Mr. Theodore S. Wilkinson, of Louisiana, offered this amendment:

For the purchase, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe, of additional lands for a site for a navy-yard and dry dock at or near the lands bought by the United States for a naval depot at Algiers, La., the establishment of which navy-yard and dry dock at Algiers, La., was recommended by the commission of naval officers appointed under the act of Congress approved September 7, 1888, a sum not exceeding $75,000.

Now, here was a paragraph incorporated in the naval appropriation bill carrying a provision embodying the recommendation of a commission appointed by authority of Congress for the purpose of investigating the question of the propriety of a navy-yard or naval station and the construction of a dry dock, which had far more force than the present paragraph has, assuming that this paragraph authorizes the construction or appropriates money for the construction of a steel floating dry dock to be used in connection with the Navy.

Mr. Charles A. Boutelle of Maine made the point of order against the amendment. The Chairman ruled:

The Chair is of opinion that this amendment is obnoxious to clause 2 of Rule XXI. The proposition of the honorable gentleman from Louisiana is to make an appropriation for the purchase of a site and the establishment of a navy-yard and dry dock, which is not an "expenditure previously authorized by law," nor is it an appropriation "in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress." It does change existing law by authorizing that to be done which is not now authorized by law. It is in sympathy with the proposition contained in the bill against which the point of order was made, and the Chair thinks the point of order is well taken as against this proposition, both in the letter and the spirit of the rule.

Now, that was for the establishment of a navy-yard, and if the establishment of a navy-yard can not be held to be a continuation of a public work in progress, namely, our naval establishment, then how can it be held that a provision authorizing or appropriating money for the construction of a steel floating dock at no place, for no purpose, so far as this paragraph is concerned, can be held in order?

On April 13, 1892, the House was in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union considering the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. William S. Holman, of Indiana, raised a point of order against a paragraph in the bill providing for the appropriation of $250,000 and the authorization of a contract for $840,000 for the construction of "a timber dry dock at Algiers, La., in accordance with the recommendation of the two commissions to report as to the most suitable site for a dry dock and navy-yard at some point on the shore of the Gulf of Mexico or the waters connected therewith, and for the purchase of such land as is shown by the report of said Commission to be necessary for the purpose in addition to the present Government reservation."

The Chairman ruled:

No existing law has been called to the attention of the Chair authorizing the adoption of a site or the purchase of the land for such site or the erection of a structure thereon. The section under consideration is therefore in conflict with the rule.

I will not read the whole decision or argument of the Chair.

Again, on March 25, 1896——

Mr. MUDD. If the gentleman would read the whole provision he would see that it provides for the purchase of land. You left out that part.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will read the whole decision. I want to be entirely fair to the Chairman and to the committee.

The question then arises, does this section come within the exception to the rule? It appears that no previous appropriations have been made for the purchase of land as a site or the erection of a structure upon such site, nor can the objects of the proposed appropriations be held to be public works or objects already in progress.

The intent of the rule is to exclude from general appropriation bills such subject-matter as involves new and original themes of discussion, and new objects of appropriation. This is a general appropriation bill, and to such bills the rule by its terms is confined. An examination of the precedents that have been called to the attention of the Chair discloses a conflict of authority. As there is such a conflict of authority, and as the provisions of the pending section appear to be in conflict with both the rule and the exception thereto, the point of order is sustained.

Mr. OLMSTED. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. TAWNEY. Certainly.

Mr. OLMSTED. The gentleman will concede that both cases to which he has referred, the paragraph against which the point of order was made provided not only for a dry dock, but for the establishment of a navy-yard, or at least for the purchase of land for a site for it. Now, a navy-yard, as we both agree, would be obnoxious to the rule. Then there being anything in the paragraph against which a point of order was good, of course the whole paragraph went out. As I understand, listening as the gentleman read, the point of order was not made upon the dry dock, but upon the whole paragraph, including the navy-yard, and the absence of a site for both the navy-yard and the dry dock.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, if there is any logic in the contention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania in respect to the dry dock being a necessary part of our naval establishment, then that same logic would apply with equal, if not greater force, to a provision for the construction of a navy-yard. The latter is equally essential to the naval establishment, because without a navy-yard you can not use a dry dock to any advantage.

A dry dock is for bringing vessels into the navy-yard for the purpose of having those vessels repaired. They can not be taken into a machine shop. You can neither float them nor wheel them into the machine shop where the repairs are actually made. They must be placed in a position where the mechanics can get all over them, all around them, and all through them, and the only way to do that is to float them into a dock and then get the water out by pumping or otherwise. There is where the repairs are made, and so far as that ship is concerned the dry dock is a navy-yard. I repeat, therefore, if there is any logic in the contention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania in respect to the dry dock, it applies equally to the navy-yards, and if appropriations for the purchase of land on which to construct a navy-yard are not in order, it of necessity follows that appropriations for the construction of a dry dock, which can not be used without a navy-yard, are equally out of order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman yield for a question on that point?

Mr. TAWNEY. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Suppose that dry dock was built for the purpose of using it in front of the New York Navy-Yard or in front of the Norfolk Navy-Yard, would it be in order, supposing the dry-dock facilities in New York and Norfolk were not sufficient? The rest of the equipment for running a navy-yard is there. Would it not be in order to build a steel dry dock to float in front of the navy-yard?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not think it would be in order, unless it was so framed as to be used exclusively in connection with a navy-yard now in existence and the necessity for it had previously been shown.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would be glad to be informed of the nature of a floating dry dock. The Chair confesses he has never seen one.

Mr. TAWNEY. Never having seen a floating dry dock myself, and being a common, ordinary layman——

Mr. OLMSTED. A landlubber——

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; a landlubber, as corrected by my friend from Pennsylvania, I will yield to my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER], a member of the Naval Committee, to give that information.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I am not a webfoot, but because of statements that have been made in my presence I do pretend to know what a steel floating dry dock is. Upon that I understand the Chair desires some information.

First of all, it is constructed of steel, as indicated by the name. Secondly, it is constructed at some place where such ships can be constructed. It is known as a ship, because it floats, and it floats of itself. It does not have on it any power by which it can be propelled. It is dragged from one place to another where it is needed. It may be sunk deep in the water, and where a ship is lying crippled the dry dock may be pushed under the crippled ship, the ship raised and repaired, then floated again from the dock.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it practicable to repair a ship in a floating dry dock where the water is so deep that the dry dock can not be securely moored or anchored?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, wherever the water is sufficiently deep to enable the dry dock to be sunk it may be sunk and floated under the ship. It is not a machine that is used exclusively in the Navy. Merchant ships are raised and floated in these dry docks. They are not new. They have been made of wood for years. A few years ago the manufacturers of steel conceived the idea that they could make them better from steel, and since that time they have been constructed of steel.

Mr. Chairman, the United States Government owns a steel floating dry dock at Algiers, La., built at some distant point and conveyed or dragged there by a steam tug owned by the Navy.

Mr. WACHTER. Built upon Chesapeake Bay.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Built upon Chesapeake Bay, as the gentleman says. The Government has another floating dry dock at Pensacola, Fla. That dock was purchased from Spain, and after the Spanish-American war was towed across and located at Pensacola. The Government owns a third steel dry dock, which is now on it way to the Philippine Islands and is supposed to be somewhere in the Red Sea.

Mr. Chairman, these docks contain machine shops; perhaps not sufficiently extensive to enable the mechanics to repair any kind of damage that might be done a ship, but where she has had a hole stove in her, where she needs to be painted, where she needs, perhaps, one or two steel plates removed, the capacity of the machine shop on the floating dry dock is considered sufficient. It is not a great machine shop. The floating dry dock contains, beside sufficient machinery to do this repair work, quarters for the men.

She has also quarters for officers. She has an officer in command; the docks are often in charge of officers of high rank. Offices are provided for them; quarters for the men; kitchens where they can cook, and beds wherein they can sleep. It is in all appearances and description a floating machine with a repair shop.

Mr. BATES. May I ask my colleague a question?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. BATES. Did not the Secretary of the Navy point out, either in his annual report or in a statement before the Naval Committee, that the great value of the dry dock was its capability in that the dock could be taken to the fleet when many times it was impossible to take the fleet to the dock? In other words, that it is a necessary part of the equipment of the modern navy?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Yes; that is a fact.

Mr. TAWNEY. Are we to understand that the Secretary of the Navy is recommending a floating steel dry dock for the purpose and upon the theory that this steel dock can follow the Navy around on the ocean; that these vessels can be repaired on the high seas at any time and under all circumstances?

Mr. BATES. The gentleman from Minnesota is partly right in his idea on that subject. The Secretary of the Navy recommends that three of four of these steel dry docks be built and that they be put at as convenient locations as possible; not that they follow every fleet in all its maneuvers, but that they be at as accessible points as possible, in order that they may be brought to the fleet when the fleet can not be taken to the dock.

Mr. TAWNEY. Do I understand the gentleman to say, and his colleague, Mr. BUTLER, of Pennsylvania, to say, that you can repair a battle ship in a floating steel dry dock at sea?

Mr. BATES. Very often.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Yes; let me answer the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. TAWNEY. Have you ever known of putting a battle ship in a dry dock on the open sea?

Mr. BATES. The docks that are now in process of construction are entirely new, and as I have never served in the Navy and never have known personally of the transaction, I can not answer the gentleman of my own personal kowledge.

Mr. TAWNEY. Is it possible to put a battle ship in a dry dock without mooring the dry dock and making it fast?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. It is.

Mr. BATES. Most certainly.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I will say to the gentleman that I never sailed in a dry dock, I never built one, and I never expect a trip in such a machine.

Mr. Chairman, the Secretary of the Navy reports in favor of these docks, and in the report he says:

To my mind, however, one of the chief elements of value to the service in such docks is their mobility. It may be very desirable under certain circumstances to send a dock to our fleet instead of sending our fleet to a dock, and the Department always feels some reluctance in sending ships which are to remain in commission to a navy-yard, for there is always more or less uncertainty when they will again become available for active duty.

During the investigation made by the Naval Affairs Committee I asked the Secretary of the Navy this question:

Suppose the dry dock is provided for Sullivans Island and there should arrive an emergency, a very grave one, that would require the dock at Pensacola, might not the dock be hauled around and used at Pensacola? Is there sufficient water at that place?

The Secretary of the Navy replied:

I am not sure whether there is or not sufficient water at Pensacola. Of course the dock can be taken anywhere that our big battle ships can use a permanent dock. The floating dock, in other words, will go substantially where the ships could use it.

It is further said in the hearings that wherever the water is sufficiently smooth this dock can be used. Of course where the waves are high the dock is not useful, but it is likely that the crippled vessel would not lie long enough to be caged; but where the water is smooth the dock could be taken to the crippled ship and the ship could be repaired at that point.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me call the attention of the Chair to the fact that on page 32 of the bill, under the head of "Naval station at Olongapo, P. I.," in order to operate the floating dry dock that is being sent there it is necessary to provide $65,000 for a wharf to moor that dock to. The section of the country from which I come is one in which floating wooden docks have been used since before the civil war, and it has never been known that a floating dock has been used away from the yard to which it was attached.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, in order that the Chair may have a little further light, my colleague [Mr. DAWSON] has called my attention to a further statement made by the Secretary of the Navy, which I will read. It is as follows:

As I stated in my annual report, the thing which I especially value the dry dock for is its mobility, that it will not be permanently located at any navy-yard.

The CHAIRMAN. Would it not be a good thing if you could have a dock that could move around and that you could take to Pensacola and all along the coast?

Secretary BONAPARTE. Yes; it would be very desirable. That is exactly why I say that I regard that dock as the one that will be the most useful to us and the one that would take the place under emergency of several located docks.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman answer a question?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I will be delighted to, if I can do it.

Mr. PERKINS. I would ask the gentleman how long he understands the Secretary of the Navy has served in the Navy and what is his actual experience? [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, that is respectfully referred, with all politeness, to my friend—to the Secretary himself.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, now that the Chair has had this elaborate explanation of what a dry dock is, I will proceed to conclude my argument on the point of order.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] will permit me, I will take a picture of a dry dock up to the Chairman.

Mr. TAWNEY. Well, inasmuch as the act of the gentleman from Tennessee in taking the picture up to the Chairman will not appear in the RECORD, I have no objection. [Laughter.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, it seems as though the gentleman who is heaving land and sea to get something into the RECORD has not succeeded.

Mr. TAWNEY. Oh, I am not objecting.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I hope that the gentleman will get all into the Chairman that he wants to. [Laughter.]

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, another ruling that was made on this identical question was on March 25, 1896. I read:

On March 25, 1896, the House being in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, considering the naval appropriation bill, Mr. HENRY H. BINGHAM, of Pennsylvania, offered an amendment for appropriating the sum of $200,000 toward the construction of a dry dock at League Island Navy-Yard.

Mr. Nelson Dingley, of Maine, made the point of order that the proposed appropriation was for an object not authorized by law.

After debate, the Chairman ruled:

"Rule XXI of the rules governing this body is identical with the rule that was adopted in the Fifty-first Congress. In that Congress, when the naval appropriation bill was under consideration, the identical question that is raised by the gentleman from Maine was then raised, and Mr. Butterworth, of Ohio, was at that time in the chair. The question was fully discussed, and after mature deliberation the Chair then held that the point of order was well taken."

The same question was raised when the naval bill was under consideration in the Fifty-second Congress. Mr. Shively, of Indiana, was then in the chair. The Chair has the RECORD before him, where the matter was fully discussed, and, while the Chair then recognized that previous to the Fifty-first Congress the ruling was as contended by the gentlemen from Massachusetts and Pennsylvania, the Chair then felt constrained to hold, both on authority and precedent, that the point was well taken. In pursuance of those two precedents, the Chair will hold that the point made by the gentleman from Maine is well taken.

I might cite other decisions which were made in succeeding Congresses on this identical point. It is impossible to distinguish, after the elaborate description of a dry dock given to the Committee of the Whole by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER], any difference in principle from a navy-yard, or the purchase of land for the construction of a navy-yard, and the appropriation of money for the construction of a dry dock, which is a necessary incident to the work of a navy-yard. In both cases, where naval appropriation bills have carried appropriations for either of these two purposes, the Chair has uniformly held that such provisions contravene clause 2 of Rule XXI of the House of Representatives, and that the point of order against them was well taken.

I want, in conclusion, to again call the attention of the Chair to the remarkable fact that the ruling of the Chair must be made upon the paragraph as it appears in this bill. It can not be made upon the assumption of facts nor upon statements made here as to the purpose for which this dry dock may be used. But assuming the facts to exist which do not appear on the record here or in this provision of the bill—even assuming those facts, and assuming that this dry dock is to be used for the repair of naval vessels, yet under all the precedents of this House the provision is nevertheless out of order and against the rule which I have just cited.

Mr. GILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. Certainly.

Mr. GILL. I would like to ask the gentleman if the rules of the House would permit the construction of a new vessel?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; that has been ruled, and the rulings made on that point draw a very clear distinction between a naval vessel and a navy-yard or a dry dock.

Mr. GILL. Now, will the gentleman permit me to ask him another question?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. GILL. And that is whether the floating dock provided for in this bill is not a vessel?

Mr. TAWNEY. The floating dock that is now on its way to Subig Bay of course is a vessel, in the sense that it floats; but in the sense that it is capable of resisting the force of an enemy, of being a fighting ship, it is not; or that it can be used when it is floating for the purpose for which it has been created, it is not.

Mr. GILL. Now, permit me to ask the gentleman this question: Is not the Dewey——

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, I shall have to ask to go ahead.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say further to the gentleman from Maryland that the purpose of the dry dock is not to float, the purpose of the dry dock is not to fight, but the purpose of the dry dock is to be moored or anchored where the vessels of the Navy, which are constructed for the purpose of floating and fighting, may be repaired.

Mr. GILL. I want to say to the gentleman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MUDD] was recognized.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, I feel that the argument against this point of order has been so well presented by the gentleman from Pennsylvania that perhaps I ought to leave it where he left it, but I am frank to say, and I make no attempt to disguise the fact, that this is a matter in which I feel considerable interest, especially in view of the extent to which the gentleman from Minnesota undertook to strongly emphasize the objectionable features of the location of this dock, from his point of view. Mr. Chairman, I take it for granted it is not necessary to warn the Chair against letting the merits of this question enter into the discussion of the controversy as to the point of order. When we come to discuss this dry dock upon its merits I rather think the Naval Committee will be able to take care of itself and to show that it is a meritorious proposition. The gentleman from Minnesota, in his last remark, falls into error, in my judgment, wherein he answers my colleague that the purpose of this dry dock is not to float. It is the very purpose of this character of dry dock. It is the very thing that distinguishes it from other dry docks in that it floats, that it is not connected with the land in any shape, that it floats out to disabled battle ships, lifts them upon itself and repairs them. I do not know just what is the actual fact in reference to the situation at Subig Bay just referred to by the gentleman from New York, nor do I know further than I infer from what is stated in the appropriation bills as to the exact character of the dry dock at Algiers, La., but I do know from the testimony of my own eyesight, Mr. Chairman, that a dock after the pattern of the Dewey, which I understand this is to be patterned after, does not need any moorings, does not need any wharf, and that all of the dry docks heretofore constructed that did need moorings, did need wharves, and did need structures to connect them with the shore, had provisions for the moorings, for the wharves and connecting structures embraced in the provisions for, and were appropriated for in connection with the dry docks themselves.

The CHAIRMAN. Let me ask the gentleman from Maryland a question?

Mr. MUDD. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it practical to repair a war vessel on the high seas in a rough sea with a floating dry dock without anchoring?

Mr. MUDD. I take it for granted that in a rough sea you could not, Mr. Chairman, just as you can not take coal from a collier aboard ship in very rough seas, as was demonstrated in the Spanish-Amrican war. You can not take coal from colliers in a very rough sea, but that does not make the collier any the less a ship and would not make a collier, because it could not coal in rough weather on the high seas, any the less a part of the Navy and a proper subject of appropriation in this bill or other naval bills. Why, Mr. Chairman, some of our ships can not do business at all in a rough sea. They can not safely go out upon the high seas in very rough seas, and they put into harbor, but they are still a part of the Navy and they can be appropriated for in this or a similar bill. Now, then, as to the exact character of these docks, which is somewhat a technical question, upon which, perhaps, some of the Members of the House, however, have almost as much knowledge as some of the gentlemen in the Navy, I may say that a few years ago a floating steel dry dock of the kind we are now building was a thing unknown. I believe the United States constructed the first one of this character and it was towed to Algiers. At that time, or, rather, before that time, when these decisions that have been referred to were being made, the last being in the Fifty-fourth Congress, in the year 1894, it could not be stated as a matter of fact that a floating steel dry dock was in order upon a general appropriation bill, because the floating steel dry dock was a thing unknown.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Let me ask the gentleman, if this is a part of the increase of the Navy, why did you not put it over in that classification in the back of the bill?

Mr. MUDD. Well, I will say I think we will try, if it goes out here, to put it in there.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. But why did it not go there in the first place, if it is properly part of the increase of the Navy?

Mr. MUDD. Because we thought, and still think, it is appropriate and in order under the head of docks, which are an essential part of the Navy.

Mr. SPARKMAN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MUDD. All right.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I want to ask, first, in what way does this dock differ from other floating docks?

Mr. MUDD. It does not differ much from the floating Dewey dry dock at all. It will perhaps be a larger one. It is the same in principle, and it is calculated, as the best expert authorities contend to-day, to be practicable, that it will be provided with large side-wall compartments that will allow the installation of extensive machinery to make extensive repairs—more extensive than even the Dewey or any dock yet constructed, making it, in effect, answer the purposes of a repair ship.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Is it intended to locate it at any particular place?

Mr. MUDD. It is not, necessarily so, except in so far—and I want to be perfectly frank about that—as the Secretary of the Navy has intimated that he thought for its home base when it would not be elsewhere occupied, when our ships were as convenient to that as to any other place. The place he had in mind was down at Solomons Island, at the mouth of the Patuxent River, in Chesapeake Bay, for the reason of the great depth of water that is there. I make this statement unchallenged, I think, that there is a greater depth of water at that particular spot of this earth's surface than in any harbor on the face of the earth covering the same area of space.

Mr. SPARKMAN. You have to come by Norfolk?

Mr. MUDD. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Have they not a good dry dock there?

Mr. MUDD. The difficulty down there is the difficulty in nearly all our navy-yards, which is this, that the draft of vessels which we are constructing to-day is so great that they can not get to our navy-yards to have our ships repaired without the aid of a floating dry dock to take them there, and this auxiliary characteristic of a floating dry dock is one of the chief reasons which suggested to the Secretary the advisability of this dock.

Now, one or two words more, Mr. Chairman, because I have not the voice to talk to the House at this time if I wanted to.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman why it is the Navy Department could not repair ships in those yards that have dry docks at the present time?

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman that that will be a more pertinent inquiry when the point of order shall have been decided and we get to the merits of this proposition; but if I may be permitted to answer here, I will say that the testimony of Admiral Endicott shows that we are confronting a very serious situation in this respect—that the vessels of the advanced type which we are constructing now require such a draft of water that it is almost impossible to get them to the dock in our ordinary yards.

Mr. McNARY. If the gentleman will permit me, I will ask him what yards?

Mr. MUDD. I will answer the gentleman and say this, that Admiral Endicott told me this morning that if you take the battle ships that had been and are being constructed, with the deepest drafts, and allow 4 or 5 feet more for a battle ship in a disabled condition, there are very few yards in the United States to which such a battle ship can be taken.

Mr. McNARY. What yards?

Mr. MUDD. I understand that Portsmouth, perhaps, has the greatest depth of any of them, and with the exception, perhaps, of New York, is about the best, and the only harbor in which the largest battle ships in a disabled condition can be taken to the existing graving stationary docks.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to say that this aspect of the discussion contributes nothing to the determination of the point of order.

Mr. MUDD. I hope I may be allowed to proceed very briefly upon the point of order.

Mr. Chairman, the determination of this question by the Chair, I apprehend, sir, depends very much upon matters of fact. In other words, the question largely is, What is a floating dry dock? What is a steel floating dry dock? Now, there is such a thing as a naval establishment recognized by law in this country. I apprehend there is no need for arguing that. I take it for granted it will not be contended that a dry dock of this character is not a part of the naval establishment, but independently of that, a little narrower than that, comprehended in that, there is a navy of the United States, the naval establishment being the generic expression, the navy technically being confined to those objects belonging thereto that float upon the sea.

This kind of dock, I repeat—and I speak now the testimony of my own eyesight, as of the time when I saw this dock down in this country—was not moored to the shore; for aught that I know was not even anchored where it had taken the Iowa and Colorado and lifted them up and docked them successfully, say, perhaps, a quarter or half a mile from the shore. It could have gone a mile farther away; it could have gone 2 miles farther away; it could have gone, according to expert authority, 20 miles down and taken up a disabled ship and carried it to a place where it could best operate in the repair of the ship. That is the chief characteristic of these floating dry docks in contradistinction from the stationary docks.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as to these precedents which have been quoted, there are just four, and I want to call the Chair's attention to them briefly.

There is one in the first session of the Fifty-first Congress and one in the first session of the Fifty-second Congress, made, respectively, by Mr. Butterworth of Ohio and Mr. Shiveley of Indiana. The two that have been read as having been made in the Fifty-fourth Congress were rendered, first, by Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois and, second, by Mr. SHERMAN of New York. These gentlemen predicated their decisions upon those which had gone before, and those which had gone before were cases in which not only was there a provision for the purchase of a dry dock, but there was a provision for the purchase and for the acquisition of land. Now, I will not pause to argue whether or not the purchase of land is a continuing "work" or "object" in the line of building up the Navy. Suffice it to say, for the understanding of the Chair now, that it has been decided that the purchase of land was obnoxious to the rule, but that where buildings were placed on the land already acquired they were not obnoxious to it.

Mr. Sherman, in the decision rendered in the Fifty-fourth Congress, gave no reason at all, gave no argument. His decision was in relation to a dry dock upon the land. I think the decision was erroneous. But it can be differentiated from this, because he simply decided on the line of decisions that had been made for graving dry docks, and there was incorporated therein also in each case a provision for the purchase of land.

Now, the gentleman from Minnesota very adroitly argues—he always argues very ably—that there is nothing in this provision to show that it is for the use and the purposes of the Navy. Mr. Chairman, I take it for granted it is only necessary to read the title of the bill, wherein it is stated it is a "bill making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year," etc. It may just as well be argued that every line of every clause of every provision for every clerk that he provides for in the numerous bills that come from his committee should particularize the specific purpose and object of his connection with the Government service as that in every clause in this bill we should say and repeat that the provision is for the use and the object and the purposes of the Navy.

Now, I say, Mr. Chairman, there is nothing specific in the way of permanent provisions of law for one-half of the structures, one-half of the objects, one-half of the purposes for which we appropriate money in the naval appropriation bill. Let me read, for instance, from page 50, under the head of "Construction and repair of vessels." Now, no man will say that these are out of order, and yet there is no particular provision of law authorizing them, and no provision except the general requirement of law for the building and maintenance of a navy. Let me read:

Designing naval vessels. Construction and repair of yard craft, lighters, and barges.

Barges and lighters, things that float, as dry docks float. They are not moored to the land or anchored, and would anyone say that they are not a part of the Navy? There is no specific statute previously authorizing any of them. They do not fight. They are auxiliary ships. We have repair ships, as this dry dock will be, used as a repair ship. We have hospital ships. We provide for receiving ships and training ships, and they are no part of the fighting force of the Navy, and they do no more to fulfill the fighting functions of the Navy than does this ship which repairs ships which get out of order. We have, further on in this paragraph: "Wear, tear, and repair of vessels afloat." What is this dry dock for? Is it not to provide against the wear and tear, and is it not for the purpose of repairing vessels afloat? Can anyone mention one single purpose, use, or object to which this dry dock can be adapted unless it be for the repair of vessels afloat? All through this bill there are appropriations, there are such provisions as that of this dry dock, coming in the different paragraphs.

Mr. Chairman, the Constitution of the United States recognizes the existence of a navy. I do not intend to discuss the Constitution of the United States. That belongs to other gentlemen; but as pertaining to this bill, I am speaking now of the authority for the Navy and for the maintenance of the Navy. I say that there is not a single statute anywhere, outside of the Constitution of the United States, that specifically says that Congress shall provide for and maintain a navy, and I apprehend it is upon that general authority that battle ships have been declared to be exempt from the point of order made against them.

So far as my judgment goes, I think the construction of the rule excluding stationary dry docks is absolutely in error. I mean graving dry docks, to which this bears no necessary analogy.

Mr. Chairman, we appropriated for building the Naval Academy. We have had that ruled upon. We appropriate for foundries, for machine shops, for the necessary equipment of the shops, and for a thousand and one purposes for which a shop is necessary in a navy-yard, and yet, when you come to the erection of a structure, upon which a ship is to be lifted and to stand while undergoing these repairs, we find an utterly illogical and inexplicable decision declaring such a structure out of order. There is no reason whatever in the ruling which excludes such a structure even as a stationary dock from the right of incorporation in a bill making appropriations for the maintenance of our Navy. There is less of semblance of a reason for the exclusion of the floating dock, which is not only a necessity and an incident of the Navy, but a part of the Navy itself.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, in this debate I have taken the Revised Statutes and have hurriedly looked through the different headings of the index, and I can not find any such institution as a steel dock, or a steel floating dock, denominated in any of the various statutes pertaining to the work of the Navy. I feel rather disposed to support a measure that is necessary to carry on the Navy as it should be carried on, but, nevertheless, I want it to be done according to law. Hence, I have investigated this matter. Now, I turn back to page 324 of the Revised Statutes, and I find this provision:

SEC. 1838. The President of the United States is authorized to procure the assent of the legislature of any State, within which any purchase of land has been made, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock yards, and other needful buildings without such consent having been obtained.

Clearly showing, Mr. Chairman, that a fort, magazine, arsenal, or a dockyard is neither a part of the Army nor the Navy; that they are separate and distinct institutions. Indeed, some of those institutions are nominated in the Constitution. They are procured under express statutes.

You will find, Mr. Chairman, in looking at the light-house law that the lights and buoys are treated, at page 906, as separate and distinct institutions from the Navy, and here is the law, of several pages, all providing for the establishment of light-houses and buoys. They are just as necessary in dangerous waters as, and far more so, than a floating dock. And yet here is a statute authorizing their establishment, clearly showing that Congress from time immemorial—I believe the first statute I read to the Chair was passed in 1828—for years and years the Congress has treated arsenals, magazines, dockyards, buoys, and light-houses as separate institutions, entirely disconnected with the Navy.

Again, Mr. Chairman, we had the Navy long before we had much of an Army. At all events, we have had it for a long, long time. We have had it without navy-yards, we have had it without light-houses, we have had it without buoys, we have had it without dry docks, we have had it without floating docks, we have had it without steel floating docks, and I challenge the gentlemen on this side or the other to show a single statute of the United States providing for the purchase of a steel dry dock or a steel wet dock or any other sort of a dock. On the contrary, when you were buying dockyards, or needed them, Congress, by an express statute, authorized the President of the United States to procure them, the word "procure" being used, as the statute I have just read provides.

Mr. TALBOTT. You mean procure the site.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I mean procure the site, yes; a "dockyard."

Mr. TALBOTT. Will the gentleman allow me one moment?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. TALBOTT. Is not the distinction this, between the dry dock that is contemplated by the act of Congress and this dry dock that is proposed now, that one of them is a floating dry dock for which you do not have to obtain a site and which can be towed by the Government to any other point it desires to use it for the purpose of repairing the vessels of the Government?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, in reply to my friend, I will state to him that there are docks that do not float and there are docks that do float and some docks that do both. This steel floating dock is such a new institution, Mr. Chairman, that with the usual frankness and candor so characteristic of the distinguished gentleman who occupies the chair, he called upon Members of the House to tell him what a steel floating dry dock is. It is an entirely new institution, unknown to the statute and many Members of the House.

Mr. TALBOTT. This is something which the necessities of the Navy require, and the Navy does not have to acquire from any State in the Union a site for it, but can tow it wherever it wants to tow it for the use of the Navy.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It is a concern without head or tail. It is without life, it is without wheels, it is without locomotion; it is something for pushing another ship into and lifting that ship up out of the water and mending it in different ways. I have seen that performance, Mr. Chairman, but I never saw it out in mid-ocean. I have seen everything in the ocean, almost, except that sort of thing. These dry docks stay close up to the shore. Japan has one, and we have some, I think; not these steel floating docks, possibly.

Now, Mr. Chairman, replying to the proposition the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] alluded to, about there being no law for the purchase of ammunition, cartridges, guns, and so forth. If the gentleman will look at the statute, which I have before me, he will find that the Secretary of War is authorized to purchase "supplies" for the Army, and the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to purchase "supplies" for the Navy. They are authorized to purchase powder, ammunition, clothes, and things of that sort. Not being an expert soldier, as I infer the gentleman from Minnesota is by his gray hairs, I was at first disposed to think that steel docks was a Navy supply, and it was possible for the Chair to construe the word "supplies" as covering this dock proposition; but I find after reading the statute more thoroughly that it clearly refers to other things—things to eat, wear, guns, etc.—and does not include docks of any kind. Section 3721 speaks of "gunpowder" and of "medicines" and "clothing and hemp" and other materials of every nature and kind. By using the words "all provisions, clothing, and hemp, and other material of every nature and kind," I was disposed to believe that the Chair would be correct in ruling that under the broad language used there he might call this dock a supply for the Navy, but when you read the whole statute, you can clearly see that it does not include or cover that kind of an institution. I dare say that when that law was enacted, in 1843, 1850, and 1866, such a thing as a steel floating dry dock was never dreamed of.

Now, if we call it a building, here is the statute that requires "before any new buildings for the use of the United States is commenced the plans and full estimates shall be prepared," etc. You go along further and you will find that the question of ammunition and the question of guns and all that sort of thing is provided for there literally in the law or is covered by the word "supplies" or "the necessary demands of the Navy." Now, we know that a steel floating dry dock is not a supply; we know it is not absolutely necessary; we know it is not a part of the Navy, because we had a Navy long before that, and that we have got along thus far without it being a part of the Navy and can still do so. Congress has not, as my friend from Minnesota knows, by statute thought enough of this dock institution to pass a law authorizing Congress to build "steel floating dry docks."

Now, it may be absolutely necessary, and possibly it is, but, gentleman, if it is you have plenty of time, you have an Naval Committee that is composed ot intelligent gentlemen, a committee that is capable and patriotic, and you can take the proposition out, look into it, and report a bill, and if you show that it is needed and that the price of a million dollars and a half is reasonable, you will have little opposition.

Mr. WACHTER. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WACHTER. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he knows—and I suppose he does—that there are already two steel floating dry docks in existence?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I guess everything you have been able to make in the last ten years is in existence, because these appropriation bills have been loaded down with things and things, appropriations of dollars and dollars, but where is the statute allowing them to be built?

Mr. WACHTER. Does not the gentleman know that there are already in existence two floating dry docks?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. There are, I presume, a few; I don't know how many.

Mr. WACHTER. Does not the gentleman consider anything a part of the naval establishment which goes to make up the building and repair of ships?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It may be a part of the machinery, but Congress has not so declared, and there is no statute broad enough to include it as a necessary appendage or to make it a part of the Navy, no more, not as much, as the light-houses and buoys. This dock is clearly not a part of a ship. As the gentleman knows, we have never built a ship that Congress has not specifically authorized its building. Here is a steel dry-dock proposition calling for nearly two millions, and yet Congress has not directed even the adoption of such an institution.

Mr. WACHTER. But they have already built two steel dry docks.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is practically prepared to rule.

The paragraph under consideration carries an appropriation for a floating dry dock. A rule of the House prohibits appropriations in general appropriation bills for expenditures "not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress." It is not claimed that the object for which the appropriation in question is sought to be made is authorized by law, but it is insisted that it is a public work or object already in progress within the meaning of the rule.

The question raised by the point of order in some of its aspects is a novel one. There is no precedent exactly covering it, and it must be decided by the application of principles recognized in the decision of analagous questions. It is settled that general naval appropriation bills may carry appropriations for additional officers and seamen, for new war vessels, for colliers, and for necessary equipment and supplies for the Navy without their being previously authorized by law.

On the other hand, it is settled by the precedents that appropriations for a new naval station, for a new navy-yard, for the selection of a site for a naval station, for the establishment of an armor-plate factory, for the erection of buildings for a naval hospital with authority to acquire a new site, for the construction of stationary dry docks are not in order in general naval appropriation bills unless previously authorized by law.

The logical inference from the precedents is that the Navy proper, consisting of the war fleet, officers, and seamen, with necessary equipment and supplies, is a public work or object already in progress within the meaning of the rule, and appropriations therefor are in order in appropriation bills without previous authority of law, while the administrative branches and the construction and repair establishments of the Navy Department, including, among other things, naval stations, navy-yards, hospitals, magazines, and stationary dry docks, do not ipso facto constitute a public work or object in progress, and appropriations therefor must be previously authorized by law.

The question for decision is whether a floating dry dock is an essential part of the equipment of the Navy proper or whether it belongs to the administrative service of the Navy Department. Dry docks are for the purpose of repairing vessels, and the only essential difference between floating dry docks and stationary dry docks is the portability of the former. Both kinds are intended for the same purpose and belong to the same class of service. Colliers have been held to be an essential part of the equipment of the Navy, obviously because they sail with naval squadrons and attend them in action as supply boats.

A floating dry dock can not convoy a naval squadron on the high seas after the fashion of a collier. It can only be taken from place to place where the sea is calm or it can be securely moored for the purpose of repairing vessels. It is not an essential part of the equipment of the Navy, but clearly belongs to the administrative service of the Navy Department. The point of order is, consequently, sustained.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, I shall not appeal from the decision of the Chair, but I give notice at this time that I shall offer this as an amendment in a little different form at another stage of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Repairs and preservation at navy-yards: For repairs and preservation at navy-yards and stations, $500,000.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. A day or two ago the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS], who has just left the Chamber, made some remarks in criticism of a criticism that I had made some weeks earlier with regard to the efficiency of certain officers of the United States as navigators and of the efficiency of our method of administering criminal justice in the Army and the Navy. The gentleman, among other things, having given a record of thirty-seven vessels that had been injured or destroyed in some forty years, said:

This record, which is complete, being taken from the records of the Navy Department, shows, etc.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to question the statement of the completeness of that record. I say that it is only partial; that it does not cover by any means the total number that should be included, and especially it is insufficient in that the larger vessels, the more expensive vessels, the vessels of modern date, are largely omitted from the list.

There is one that I have in mind that the gentleman can not be criticised for not enumerating, because the accident happened about the moment of his declaration of freedom from negligence on the part of these gentlemen. That was the one in which one of our larger vessels went ashore a few days ago while going into York River. Certainly, if there is any position, any port, any part of our navigable waters that the Navy and the officers of the Navy ought to be familiar with, it should be that historic portion of our waters. They ought to be able to get in and out there. He omitted the instance, quite recent, where one of our squadrons, I think, consisting of four vessels, attempted to get out of the port of New York. They succeeded partially in doing it, although they ran two of the vessels into the mud and got the other two into violent and dangerous collision. The gentleman has omitted that from his list.

The gentleman has omitted that other case, quite recent, where one of our larger and more valuable vessels was run into a dock in the harbor of New York. One would suppose these gentlemen would be familiar with such waters.

The gentleman also omitted that other instance where only a short time ago one of our modern vessels was run upon a rock in the vicinity of Newport. One would suppose that that place would be somewhat familiar to these gentlemen, and that they certainly would be able to navigate their vessels in such waters.

Mr. Chairman, these are only a few that occur to me from my knowledge gained from the newspapers of these instances of inefficiency, of incapacity to handle these great vessels. We are spending millions of dollars to build up a great navy. I think it is the part of patriotism to do this, but there ought to be some guaranty, some assurance, that when we secure such vessels they will not be recklessly destroyed by incompetency and inefficiency.

Another astonishing statement was made by the gentleman the other day, namely, that the longevity of one of these great vessels, costing many millions of dollars, was but sixteen years. The Texas, going into commission only sixteen years ago, the gentleman told the committee, was now on its way to the scrap pile, and when asked the question if that was the average period he said it ought not to be, but left the inference that it was. It is only a short while ago that I saw a criticism upon the part of some naval officer of the Oregon—the Oregon now characterized by him as obsolete. Yet, Mr. Chairman, it is only a little while ago that that then splendid vessel cost this Government between five and six millions of dollars.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more to conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Iowa may have five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman criticised me, I thought, with some ascerbity because I said that, in my judgment, there was not proper punishment meted out to those who, I thought, had recklessly, carelessly, and wantonly put in jeopardy these great interests of ours. I still believe that our system of administering criminal justice in the Army and Navy is lamentably faulty; that it is almost impossible to secure fairness of judgment on the part of those who are to try criminal malefactors. Think of it! The courts are made up from the classmates, from the companions in arms, from the friends and associates, from the military family of which they are all alike members.

There is a community of interest and a community of feeling among them. They are all more or less acquainted; the children are intimates; the wives are intimates and associates; they are as a rule poor, each one knows the pecuniary condition of the other, and everyone knows that if that sentence is imposed that stops the pay or that lessens it there is suffering and want and privation. That fact is brought home to all, and it would be strange indeed if under the circumstances of the association and acquaintance and community of interest it did not have its effect, and I say that it is the truth that the punishments that have been inflicted, some of which the gentleman referred to, have been inconsiderable indeed in comparison with the offense. There are other countries where the naval officer who loses his vessel feels so overwhelmingly a sense of disgrace that suicide is his only remedy, his only relief, and it is expected that that will be his self-inflicted punishment.

Mr. WEEKS. It is a crime in this country to commit suicide, I believe.

Mr. HEPBURN. I think it is. I am not speaking of that for the purpose of suggesting that it ought to be a remedy, but I am speaking of it for the purpose of showing how this offense of throwing away your ship is regarded in other countries as compared with ours. The gravest punishment that the gentleman could find in all the annals of courts-martial for offenses of this kind, if I mistake not, was suspension from the active duties and active pay for three years.

Mr. WEEKS. Oh, I beg your pardon. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEPBURN. I do.

Mr. WEEKS. If the gentleman from Iowa had carefully read what was said he would have found that officers have been dismissed—several cases—for the loss of ships, and in one instance an officer was dismissed who had previously been dismissed from the service and restored by act of Congress.

Mr. HEPBURN. That may be. I stand corrected, but I had in my mind the twenty-six cases to which I referred, and in all of those punished my recollection is there was none more severe than this suspension from active duties for three years, and in that case it was finally reduced to two, and I submit that that was not a very serious punishment. Now, Mr. Chairman, I think that it is due to this House, in view of the criticism of myself that the gentleman from Massachusetts has indulged in, that he make a fair statement of all of this class of offenses and that he give to us a real statement of the cases and of the punishment, and with that I will be entirely content, satisfied that the facts as he will be compelled to give them will take away all the sting of his criticism of myself.

Total public works, navy-yards and stations, $2,848,450.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to move to strike out the words "total public works." They have not appeared heretofore in naval appropriation bills and there is no necessity for them. They were put in by the clerk, but the printer did not strike them out, as he should have done. In lines 15, 16, and 17, "total public works."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I desire to discuss that matter, not that particular thing, but——

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois withdraws the amendment.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I simply desire to bring a little but very valuable official information before the committee, which I think is rather pertinent here, and I think when you gentlemen hear me through for a minute or two that you will be very much surprised at the statement I shall read. I hold in my hand page 946, volume 19, of Report of the Industrial Commission, issued in 1902. It states that Naval Constructor Albert W. Stahl, at a hearing of the Naval Committee of the House, submitted the following table relative to certain private-built ships, showing that the "total cost" of such ships is considerably in excess of the "contract price."

A few moments ago the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] alluded to the Oregon as costing about five or six million dollars, I believe. This report shows her "total cost" was "$5,914,021.90," while the "contract price"—and here is the point—was "$3,301,510." The excess of the "total cost" over the "contract price" was "$2,612,511.90." The contract price of the Massachusetts was $3,090,000. The total cost was $5,401,844.97, or a difference of $2,311,844.97. The contract price for the Indiana, named for the State wherein the distinguished chairman lives, was $3,090,000. Her total cost was $5,333,708.05, or a difference of $2,243,708.05. The total cost of the Monterey was $2,268,281.75, and the contract price was $1,674,839.60, a difference of $593,442.15. The total cost of the Olympia was $2,484,027.74, and the contract price was $1,796,000, a difference of $688,027.54.

Now, I am going to ask the chairman of the committee who reports this bill, or some one else who can answer the question, for an explanation of this: Why is it that in the case of the Monterey, Olympia, San Francisco, Oregon, Massachusetts, and Indiana the "total cost" of each vessel has gone beyond the "contract price" all the way from $593,442.15 in the Monterey to $2,612,511.90 beyond the contract price in the Oregon? Can the gentleman tell us why that occurred?

Mr. FOSS. I did not get the question.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It is a very important one. I would like to get some explanation.

Mr. FOSS. I would like to hear it again.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It is a very important one. I have read in the hearing of the committee an official statement from the naval constructor, Albert W. Stahl, found in Industrial Commission Report, Volume XIX, page 946, and he states that in the case of building the immortal Oregon the "contract price" was $3,301,510, and the "total cost" was $5,914,021.90, or a difference of $2,612,511.90. Now, can the gentleman account for that increased cost? That is a sample of a number of other cases I have cited.

Mr. FOSS. The first cost is for the hull and machinery, and the other is for the completed ship, which takes in the armament.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman may think he is right. I hope he is; but here is the way that Albert W. Stahl, the naval constructor, stated it, and here is the way the Industrial Commission prints it: "The total cost of the Oregon was $5,914,021.90, and the contract price was $3,301,510, a difference of $2,612,511.90." The "contract price" and the "total cost" are the terms used.

Now, on page 945 of this report is a statement of the cost of ships made by private contract and those made in the Government yards. The committee and these naval men were paralleling the two kinds of expenses. They were comparing Government-made ships with private-made ships. Mr. Chairman, I was in hopes that the gentleman, who is so well informed on those matters, could explain it to the committee and explain to the country——

Mr. FOSS. Let me read the report.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Here it is.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] has expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of discussing this matter a little further. Just a brief statement, and I will be through. On the other page, as the gentleman will see, Admiral Bowles compares the Texas and the Indiana, showing that the Government-made ship, which was the Texas, I believe, cost, I think, 7 per cent more than the Indiana, that was made in a private yard, although the Texas had to wait for her armor, though it was called for before the private contractors called for their armor; yet the Texas was made to wait until the private persons were supplied. Mr. Chairman, this report gives very valuable information. It discusses two propositions, the virtues of having these ships built in Government yards and in private factories. It treats both sides of the proposition, and that being the case, Mr. Chairman, I will ask that I may be permitted to print this report in the RECORD, so that we can all read it.

Mr. FOSS. I will read it then, and make explanation of it later.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to print the document to which he has referred in the RECORD in connection with his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The document is as follows:

GOVERNMENT AND PRIVATE MADE SHIPS.

Several witnesses before the Industrial Commission have advocated the policy that all work constructed for either the Federal, State, or local governments should be constructed directly by the employees of the Department and not through contractors. The main argument advanced in favor of this policy is the higher wages and fewer hours of public employees, and the disadvantage which, on this account, the system of direct employment is under in comparison with the longer workday and lower wages paid by contractors. An investigation made by the Department of Labor in four leading cities reaches the conclusion that in public employment, in general, the highest rate of wages is paid for the shortest working day. The advantages and disadvantages of public employment in the Navy Department have been summarized as follows by Chief Naval Constructor F. T. Bowles, in a hearing before the House Committee on Naval Affairs, wherein he advocated a larger use of the navy-yards for constructing war vessels. The advantages named are:

1. Maintenance of efficiency of the force and plant by keeping them in continuous use. These are already required for repairs, but when repairs are not needed the force must be temporarily discharged. If a vessel could be under construction at all times, the employees, when there is lack of repair work, could change to construction work, and the force could thereby be kept in constant employment.

2. Repairs could be made more economically and rapidly, since an adequate staff of employees would be at hand, without the necessity of breaking in new and inexperienced help.

3. It would reduce the amount of repair work, which at present is magnified in order to maintain a force of employees when permanent work is not ahead.

4. Maintains a standard of workmanship and design on a basis of practical experience.

5. Provides training for those who must inspect contractors' work. An ignorant inspector is fussy and demands too much in unimportant and costly ways, so that the contractor will add 15 or 20 per cent to his next price.

6. No profit to be made on the plant.

7. Indirect charges, which in commercial practice make a large percentage of the cost, are not included, because these navy-yards are already maintained for repair purposes. This is practically a saving of interest on plant, taxes, insurance, depreciation and care of property, and a large proportion of the office and organization expense. For these expenses merchant shipyards estimate from 25 to 35 per cent on the cost of material and labor going into the ship.

8. The cost of inspection is saved, since the inspectors and draftsmen of the navy-yard act as inspectors when the ships are constructed at the navy-yard. There are more people inspecting the ships built by contract than it takes to manage the work of construction of the same ships in the navy-yard.

9. Cost of trial trip is saved.

10. Saves the claims for extras by private contractors who endeavor to make these as large as possible. The builders of the Indiana brought suit before the Court of Claims for extras to the amount of $483,000.

Disadvantages named are:

1. The cumbersome system of design and of management by independent bureaus in the Navy Department. There is the Bureau of Construction, which designs the hull; the Bureau of Ordnance, which specifies the armament and armor plate; the Bureau of Steam Engineering, which designs the boilers and machinery; the Bureau of Equipment, which puts in the anchors, chains, and electric lighting. Practically there is no center head. In the case of contract work these bureaus feel a certain responsibility to coordinate their work, more or less, because otherwise charges for extras, which are prescribed by law, must be allowed.

2. Wages in the navy-yards are 30 to 40 per cent higher by the day than those paid in private yards, and since the number of hours is eight instead of ten, as on contract work, this adds another 30 to 35 per cent to the cost of labor per hour, making the wages per hour 60 per cent to 75 per cent higher than the wages per hour paid by contractors. The law requires that these wages be the same as those paid in the vicinity, but these are only small repair shops, without steady work, consequently wages are regulated by the trade unions on the basis of irregular work.

3. Boy and unskilled labor is not used to advantage on account of artificial restrictions of the labor board, necessitated by the civil-service law. An employee, according to that law and the regulations thereunder, can be employed only on the kind of work for which he is registered, and can not be transferred to other work. This, while it is necessary in order to protect the civil-service law against evasion, increases the cost of labor compared with the cost to contractors.

4. Seven holidays fully paid, or two and one-half times pay for holiday work.

5. Purchase of material by the navy system involves delay and extra cost. The time and trouble of bidding and furnishing bonds drives off many good contractors. The materials thus cost 10 per cent more than under private management. This is an infirmity of public management, in which interest and good management depend upon the system rather than upon the individual, but it would be largely obviated by buying in larger quantities if the Government had more work to do, as in England. Our public shipyards should be allowed to buy for future needs when prices are low, which can not be done because the contractor is not allowed to exercise his individual judgment.

6. Outside plants are better arranged and no restrictions are placed on untilization of space to the best advantage.

7. Per diem compensation is used where office work is economical.

8. Navy-yards give no bond or guaranty of performance under contract conditions.

Mr. Bowles stated that—

The English Government has shown that a government can build ships in competition with outside shipyards. Nobody can say that we can not do it, because we can. It is only a matter of the means, the regulations, and the methods, and the men; and it can be done, and it can be done very quickly, if you want to do it—very quickly. There is no question about it. In other countries the custom is somewhat different. The practice in England of building a large proportion in the merchant shipyards and varying that proportion in accordance with the degree of activity which exists outside—that is, if the outside shipyards are dull the work is put there; if they are busy the other part of the work is taken into the Government yards—encourages and keeps up the merchant shipyards and enables them to keep steadily on in their work, and at the same time gives the Government efficient yards of their own."

Constructor Bowles estimated that the cost of construction of vessels in navy-yards under the conditions existing at the time of the hearing would be fully 15 per cent in excess of the cost done by contract, but that an equivalent saving would be made over private-built ships if the navy-yards were properly organized, as they can be without much difficulty. He estimated further that, with these improvements, the New York Navy-Yard could build ships as cheaply as they are built by contractors, not including the indirect charges for interest, insurance, taxes, depreciation, and management, which are already covered by the need of the navy-yards as repair shops. In his judgment the best results are obtained when ships are constructed both by contractors and by the navy-yards.

Since the time when this testimony was given before the House Naval Committee Congress has adopted a law granting employees in the navy-yards fifteen days' leave of absence each year with full pay. This is unquestionably one of the most serious blows that have been struck against a further extension of public employment in place of contract work in the construction of war vessels. Deducting fifteen days at full pay increases the labor cost 7½ per cent, and makes it impossible, with the handicap already existing, for those who are responsible for public work to advocate a further substitution of direct employment for the contract system.

The following table was submitted by Constructor Bowles, showing comparatively the cost of four ships built in the navy-yards and three built in private yards. The final column shows the cost per ton of the finished vessel. The two battle ships, the Maine and the Texas, built in the navy-yards, may be compared with the Indiana, built about the same time in a private yard. The Maine cost somewhat more than the Texas, but comparing the Texas with the Indiana, including in the cost of the latter not only the first cost under the contract, but also the final cost of the finished vessel, it is seen that the cost of the Texas per ton was $819, and the cost of the Indiana per ton completed was $669, so that the Texas cost more than the Indiana by 22.4 per cent.

The Raleigh, built in the Government yards, was the most expensive type of ship ever built at that time, on account of the large amount of machinery put into such a very small vessel, the cost being $780 for hull and machinery. Of vessels built by contractors, that which is nearest in type to the Raleigh is the Minneapolis, which cost $462 per ton for hull and machinery. But the final cost was $817 for the Raleigh and $624 for the Minneapolis. The Raleigh may also be compared with the Detroit, which shows a cost of $817 as against $740 in private construction.

[a] Built in navy-yard. [b] Built in private yard. [c] Amount expended in navy-yards. [d] Contract price. [e] Contractors have sued for $483,000 damages, which would bring cost to $724, or 13 per cent of the Texas.

THE TEXAS WAS HANDICAPPED.

There were peculiar reasons why the ships built in the Government yards should have cost more at the time they were built than would be the case at the present time. No ship had been built in the Norfolk yard for twenty-five years, so that an expense of nearly $100,000 for machinery and equipment had to be made and charged to the vessel. The day the building of the Texas was begun the Navy Department appointed eleven foremen, none of whom had ever had anything to do with the building of a steel ship. The handicap suffered, owing to this unprepared condition, and the necessity of educating the labor, is estimated at about 15 per cent. This deducted from the cost of the Texas would bring that vessel down to within 7 per cent of the Indiana. The Texas was delayed by the nondelivery of the armor, although the order was delivered to the mill before the orders of private contractors. The contractors on the other ships had influence enough to get in ahead, on the ground that they would sue for damages if delayed.

Naval Constructor Albert W. Stahl, at the hearing of the Naval Committee of the House, submitted the following table relative to certain private-built ships, showing that the total cost of such ships is considerably in excess of the contract price:

Prior to the adoption of civil-service rules and their extension to the labor service, public employment was seriously handicapped through the inefficiency of those employed, but since the adoption of these rules it is quite generally agreed that the efficiency of employees in the navy-yards has greatly improved. The main handicap at the present time, in comparison with work done by contractors, is found in the fewer hours, the higher wages, the holidays and leave of absence, and the veterans' preference. This disadvantage holds true, more or less, for all branches of government, not only National, but State and local, and in the latter case it applies mainly to the larger cities, since the smaller local divisions generally pay the same wages and observe the same hours as in the neighboring private employment. Within the past few years there is to be observed a tendency to extend, through legislation, the same conditions of hours and wages to contractors on public works as those provided by law for public employees on the same class of work. Kansas in 1891 and New York in 1897 enacted a so-called "prevailing rate of wages law," requiring every contract for the construction of the public work to contain a provision that the same shall be void and have no effect unless the prevailing rate for the legal day's work in the same trade or calling in the locality where the work is to be done shall be paid by the contractor to his employees. This law was declared unconstitutional in New York by the court of appeals on the grounds that it was not a police measure and it interfered with the freedom of contract. In Great Britain, where public wages are but slightly higher than those paid in private employment, it is at the present time quite generally the rule that contractors on public works are required to pay the same wages and observe the same hours as the public departments themselves. Apart from the question of unconstitutionality, a regulation of this kind, applying to public employment in the different branches of government in this country, is not only a means of placing public and private employment on the same level of proper regard for the interests of those whose services are rendered for the public, but also the only means of placing the two systems of constructing public works on such an equality, respecting cost of labor, as not to seriously handicap public employment in a comparison between the two.

The Clerk read as follows:

PUBLIC WORKS UNDER THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.

Buildings and grounds, Naval Academy: Toward the construction of buildings, and for other necessary improvements at the Naval Academy, Annapolis, Md., as authorized by the acts of Congress approved June 7, 1900, and March 3, 1903, $750,000.

Mr. HEPBURN. If I had had the time a little while ago I would have made reference to an article which I observed in the Washington Post of this date, bearing upon this same subject of the inadequacy of our methods, or the inefficiency of our methods, of punishment of naval officers.

I will send it to the Clerk's desk with the request that it be read. It is the first article on the seventh column of the first page.

The Clerk read as follows:

REBUKE OF NEWBERRY—COURT-MARTIAL CENSURED IN SCHOFIELD TRIAL—LIEUTENANT IS REPRIMANDED—OFFICER WHO RAN THE TORPEDO DESTROYER WINSLOW ON A SHOAL IS SCORED IN PLAIN LANGUAGE BY THE ACTING SECRETARY OF THE NAVY—ORDERED RELEASED FROM ARREST AND RESTORED TO DUTY.

A stinging rebuke was administered by Acting Secretary of the Navy Newberry yesterday to the officers who conducted the court-martial in the case of Lieut. John A. Schofield, U. S. N., for running the torpedo destroyer Winslow on a shoal near Norfolk last February.

Twice Mr. Newberry sent back the proceedings of the court for reconsideration, pointing out that the board, in attempting to show leniency to the officer, was placing its interpretation of regulations and decisions of the Navy Department above the interpretation placed on them by the Department itself.

Each time the court sent back its first findings, refusing to change the sentence, which was nothing more than a public reprimand by the Secretary of the Navy.

STRONG LANGUAGE EMPLOYED.

"It is difficult to understand the display of obstinacy or obtundity thus presented," says Mr. Newberry in his remarks on the result of the court-martial. "The failure of justice which ensues and the injury which the discipline of the service must necessarily suffer at the hands of those to whom it is intrusted, and by whom it should be most zealously guarded, the court is responsible for.

"The Department considers it timely to advise courts-martial that neglect on the part of the naval courts to uphold the regulations governing the Navy is as grave a neglect of duty and as far-reaching in its injurious effect upon the service as neglect or violation of those regulations by officers while in positions of responsibility."

Mr. Newberry's view of the case is that Lieutenant Schofield clearly disregarded specific naval regulations, and this view is also held by the Judge-Advocate-General of the Navy, who reviewed the evidence of the case.

Mr. HEPBURN. I think, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman should pursue his inquiries in this direction, he would find that there are very many cases similar to this where the reviewing officer has refused to give his assent or has been reluctant to give his assent to the views and judgment of the court.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to suggest to the gentleman from Iowa that if he will pursue that inquiry as I have he will find eight similar cases in the last forty years; and, as I showed in the statement I made last Saturday, there have been four times as many cases where the sentence of the court-martial has been considered too severe and reduced as there have been where the reviewing authority, who is always a civilian, has considered the sentence too lenient. This is one of those instances which happened to occur to-day. That is all.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Naval training station, Great Lakes, buildings: Toward the construction of buildings, and for other necessary improvements at the naval training station, Great Lakes, $750,000: Provided, That before any of this sum is expended complete plans shall be prepared and approved by the Secretary of the Navy covering the contemplated new buildings at the naval training station, Great Lakes, which plans shall involve a total expenditure of not more than $2,000,000: Provided further, That after the preparation and approval of the plans herein provided for the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to enter into contract, or contracts, for the buildings on plans as approved, to an amount not to exceed $2,000,000, to be paid for as appropriations may from time to time be made by law.

Mr. FOSS and Mr. UNDERWOOD rose.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer an amendment there.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I rose for the purpose of making the point of order. I will reserve it until the gentleman gets through.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to move to strike out the words "and for other necessary improvements."

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. What line do you find those words in?

Mr. FOSS. Lines 25 and 26, page 34. So that it will read "toward the construction of buildings at the naval training station."

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment is not in order until the point of order has been disposed of.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to make the point of order against the first proviso. I have no objection to that part of it. I do desire to make the point of order to the second proviso, commencing on line 8, on page 35, and going down to line 13, which provides that—

After the preparation and approval of the plans herein provided, the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to enter into contract, or contracts, for the buildings on plans as approved, to an amount not to exceed $2,000,000.

My point of order against this is that it is new law. It takes out of the hands of Congress the power to control this question. I do not think it is good legislation. I would say to the gentleman from Illinois I have no objection whatever to his going ahead improving and building this college plant there, but I do object to this class of legislation.

Mr. FOSS. I will say to my friend from Alabama that it is the opinion of the Department that if they can enter into contracts for the construction of these buildings in advance this way, it will be the most economical way to do the work. The Department sent us a letter specially requesting that it be enabled to make contracts and go on with the construction of the whole plant.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no doubt that is the truth about it——

Mr. FOSS. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his point of order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD (continuing). If we steadily pursue this form of legislation.

Mr. FOSS. We did this in connection with the Naval Academy, and also in connection with the academy at West Point. This is for the training of the men in the Navy, and it is following out the same line as the provisions in those two other cases. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his point of order, because it works for economy in the building of this station.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will state to my friend from Illinois that my objection is not to the getting the plans, but in the adoption of those plans in appropriation bills. Congress ought to control the appropriations up to the final acceptance of the plans and the completion of the work.

Now, if the gentleman intended to make a full apropriation for this amount of money, which he recognizes would be needed to complete this plant, or improvement at this time, why then I have no objection to his making an appropriation that would cover to-day the whole question; or if these plans are made next year or the year after, if he will come and lay before the House what he is going to do, Congress can appropriate intelligently in reference to what the money is going to be expended for. I would have no objection to his making the appropriation for the full amount of money. But I do object to our adopting a system of legislation that takes out of the hands of Congress this power, with a plan not having been determined on, when we do not know what we are going to do.

Mr. FOSS. The preliminary plans, the sketch plans, have been made upon which estimates were based. Of course the full detail plans have not been made.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think it is a bad class of legislation, and I shall insist upon objecting to all legislation of this kind. I am not going to object to the first proviso. I believe that is subject to the point of order, as I understand it, but I do not object to that.

I am perfectly willing for the gentleman to go ahead with his plans, but I think he is forcing legislation on the House that is not in accordance with the usual form of legislation, and I do not think the gentleman ought to put it in his bill. I think when he has completed these plans and is able to say to the House exactly what he is going to do, he should then come here and ask for money to carry out those plans.

Mr. FOSS. I know; but the Navy Department are very anxious to go ahead with this training station, because they need it. The Chief of the Bureau of Navigation, as I read the other day, spoke of the need of this naval training station, and the Department is very anxious to get it established at once.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am satisfied that between now and next winter the gentleman can not expend more than the $750,000 that the bill carries, and if he can he should increase that appropriation.

Mr. FOSS. That will not allow the Secretary to enter into any contracts for the construction of the whole thing. If we build a few buildings each year, it will cost much more than if you allow contracts for the whole proposition at once.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I should like to agree with the gentleman, but I do not think that Congress should turn its hands loose and turn this matter entirely over to the Secretary of the Navy and the contractors. As a matter of good legislation, we ought to know what we are spending our money for, and these plans ought to be presented to the House after they are agreed on before we make the appropriation.

Mr. FOSS. The same character of legislation has been enacted in reference to the building of the Naval Academy at Annapolis and the Military Academy at West Point. Almost identically the same provisions are contained in this paragraph.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to my friend from Illinois that it is a well-known fact that we pursued this course in reference to the Naval Academy—left the drawing of those plans in the hands of the Secretary of the Navy and subject to contract—and what did we find? We found that they did not stick to what Congress had told them to do; that they made the plans so that we had to vastly enlarge the appropriations beyond anything we contemplated in the beginning. Why? Because we turned the hands of Congress loose and let the Department go ahead and complete their plans and make contracts that we had to pay afterwards, a very much larger sum than Congress contemplated.

That is the very reason why I do not want the gentleman, in building this particular building, to pursue that policy. It will be pursued—I do not mean by the gentleman from Illinois at all—but if we turn the Department loose to draw the plans and make the contracts we will find that before this building is completed we will have another bill in excess, and we will have to come here and increase the limit of cost. That is contrary to existing law, and I must insist on the point of order, because I believe we ought to hold our hands on that appropriation until these plans are made. It is in the interest of economy.

Mr. FOSS. As I said to the gentleman that sketch plans or preliminary plans have been made, and these estimates which are sent here by the Secretary of the Navy are based on those plans. If you allow this limitation, it will mean economy of construction. If you strike out the limit, then as material goes up, it may increase the limit of cost; and the purpose of the Naval Committee has been to hold the limit of cost down as far as possible. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his point of order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman that I should like to withdraw my point of order, if it was a matter of accommodation to him, but the House has tried this thing repeatedly, and we have never authorized a contract to be made in advance, under these circumstances, that they did not come back to increase the limit of cost, and I think right now we ought to stop. I am not objecting to the gentleman's completing his plan, but I do object to the authorization of this contract in advance.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has made a point of order against what particular line?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. My point of order only applies to that part of the paragraph from line 8 to and including line 13 on page 35.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, there is no question in my mind as to the propriety of this legislation. In view of the fact that Congress has already authorized the establishment of this station, I have no doubt that this is in order. This provision makes appropriation toward the construction of buildings, $750,000.

The proviso that the gentleman alludes to, including the one above, is a limitation upon the appropriation. I do not think it is subject to a point of order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The point I make relating to the proviso is not a limitation. The part of the paragraph I make the point of order to is the part of the paragraph that authorizes the Secretary of the Navy to make contracts before the appropriation is made. Now, that is directly contrary to existing law. not longer ago than the last Congress we passed an act expressly prohibiting contracts being made for money that was not appropriated, and this provision directly comes in the face of that existing law, because this provision will authorize the Secretary of the Navy to make contracts before the money is appropriated. I do not see where there can be any question that it is contrary to existing law, and to this extent repeals the statute that we enacted on the general deficiency bill at the last session of Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman think that is a limitation which applies to this provision here?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Secretary undoubtedly, if we strike out this proviso, could not make a contract to carry on this work. Why? Because the law that we passed in the general deficiency bill of the last Congress expressly prohibited the Department officers from making any contracts or incurring any obligation that was not authorized by law and appropriated for.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman claim that the entire amount of the contract should first be appropriated for?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That the head of a Department was not authorized to make any contract—in other words, Mr. Chairman, for many years it has been the policy pursued by the heads of Departments to go ahead and make contracts in reference to Government work, and then come back to Congress and say these contracts were made and you must pay the bill.

Now, to obviate that trouble, to stop that leak, the Congress at the last session in the general deficiency bill passed a law which made it a misdemeanor for any head of a Department to make a contract that was not expressly authorized by Congress.

Mr. FOSS. Did not that relate to the ordinary running expenses of the Government?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It related to the ordinary running expenses of the Government and to all expenses for any purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. Where is the statute which the gentleman refers to—in what bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think it was in the last general deficiency bill. It may have been in the sundry civil bill. My recollection is that it was a part of the general deficiency bill passed at the last session of the last Congress.

Mr. PERKINS. May I make a suggestion to the gentleman?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. PERKINS. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that perhaps there is no necessity of looking at that statute, for certainly no executive officer has authority to make a contract for the construction of a building that will bind the Government, unless there is an express provision of law that authorizes it. It requires a statute in order to authorize them to make such a contract. It certainly could not be for a moment questioned before a court of law that if the Secretary of the Navy, for example, should make a contract for the construction of a building at Annapolis, or elsewhere, unless there was some express authority of law, his contract would be void. In other words, the Secretary, in order to make a valid contract for the construction of these buildings, requires authority of law. That is the authority which is to be given by this provision now before the Chair. In other words, it is a provision that must be enacted in order to give the Secretary authority, and because it must be enacted it is new law.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman have in mind the fact that appropriations for war ships are carried in appropriation bills every year?

Mr. PERKINS. That is where appropriations have been made. If Congress authorizes the expenditure of money, the Department is undoubtedly authorized to expend it.

The CHAIRMAN. It is the practice to carry the authority to make the contract with the appropriation in connection with objects authorized by law or public works and objects already in progress.

Mr. PERKINS. True, but here no appropriation is made, but the Secretary of the Navy is directed to make plans, and after the plans are made he is authorized to make a contract which will in the future require an appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The paragraph carries the appropriation with it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think the Chair misapprehends how the paragraph reads. The paragraph makes an appropriation of $750,000, and the next paragraph provides that the limitation shall be $2,000,000. When you make an appropriation for a battle ship, and you say $3,000,000 for the whole, you can make the contract for $3,000,000 of course. He has the money in his hands, he has it with which to pay for it, and he makes the contract up to the amount that Congress has appropriated; but in this case there is an appropriation of $750,000, and he is asking the authority to make contracts in excess of the amount of money that Congress has appropriated. In reference to a battle ship the bill reads:

One first-class battle ship, carrying as heavy armor and as powerful armament as any known vessel of this class, to have the highest practicable speed and greatest practicable radius of action, and to cost, exclusive of armor and armament, not exceeding $6,000,000.

I think the Chair will find, if he looks at the decisions, that where the words "by contract" are placed in a provision even of this kind for a battle ship, they have been held to be out of order.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, pertinent to the proposition of law stated by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS] a moment ago, I read section 5503, as follows:

Every officer of the Government who knowingly contracts for the erection, repair, or furnishing of any public building, or for any public improvement, to pay a larger amount than the specific sum appropriated for such purpose shall be punished by imprisonment not less than six months nor more than two years, and shall pay a fine of $2,000.

I do not know to what extent the law of last session amends that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to say to the committee that this point of order raises quite an important question, and the Chair desires some little time to investigate, and asks unanimous consent that the paragraph and the point of order pending may be passed without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, does that include all amendments to the paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. All amendments to the paragraph. It will be read, when the committee sits again, as a new paragraph.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There has been no action taken upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss]?

The CHAIRMAN. No; the amendment would not be in order until the point of order is disposed of. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

PUBLIC WORKS, BUREAU OF ORDNANCE.

Naval magazine, Dover, N. J.: One brick building to be used for drying smokeless powder, $4,500; electric lights and feed wires for magazines Nos. 4 and 5, $600; in all, naval magazine, Dover, Lake Denmark, New Jersey, $5,100.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would ask how much is carried in the bill altogether for the manufacture by the Government of smokeless powder?

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, for the purchase and manufacture of smokeless powder $500,000 is carried under the Bureau of Ordnance in an earlier part of the bill, on page 11.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then we have passed that item?

Mr. FOSS. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How much of that is usable for the purpose of manufacturing down here at the factory?

Mr. FOSS. They can use as much as they like. Most of it I think is used for manufactures.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Naval magazine, New England coast: Toward securing the land and the erection of the necessary buildings on ground, the purchase of which is now under negotiation, as authorized by the act approved April 27, 1904, for a new naval magazine on the New England coast; also toward inclosing said grounds, grading and filling in, building roads and walks, improvement of the water front, necessary wharves and cranes, railroad tracks, and rolling stock for local service, fire and water service, and equipment of the establishment, including the service of such additional expert aids, surveyors, architects, superintendents of construction, or draftsmen, as may be necessary for the preparation of the plans and specifications and prosecution of the work to an extent not to exceed $15,000, $200,000: Provided, That when the naval magazine on or near the New England coast provided for by an act of Congress approved April 27, 1904, is completed, the Secretary of the Navy shall discontinue the present magazine in the city of Chelsea, Mass., and sell such portion of the magazine and naval hospital grounds in said city of Chelsea as is undesirable for hospital purposes at public auction or private sale, upon such terms and conditions as shall be satisfactory to him, and the money derived from such sale shall be applied to remodeling and modernizing the hospital buildings now on said hospital grounds, and the balance of said money, if there be any after said remodeling and modernization, shall be placed to the credit of the hospital fund of the Navy.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee a question with reference to the cost of plans for this naval magazine and the fees of architects. After the experience we had at the Naval Academy and the extravagance in that direction, it is an interesting proposition to know what the architect is going to cost.

Mr. FOSS. Well, I could not state to the gentleman. I do not think that any architects have yet been employed in reference to the building. In fact I know they have not been.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Chairman, the buildings designed for a naval magazine are very unornamental. They are not large buildings; they are small detached buildings, scattered over as wide an area as possible, in order to prevent the danger of one building being blown up if another building near it should explode. They are rather inexpensive buildings, most of them, and the greater part of the amount provided for in this item of the bill will be for the purchase of the land and the laying out and the making of it accessible, the building of wharves, and so on, so that they can get up to the magazine by water, and then the building of these inexpensive detached buildings scattered as far as possible over the surface of the ground. It is my understanding that the Department itself prepares its own plans for these naval magazines, and they do not go outside for architects, because the buildings are not large or intricate enough to require an outside architect.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If that is true, why put the word "architect" in there?

Mr. SLAYDEN. There seems to be nothing in the bill to guard the public against the expenditure of excessive fees, and it may be possible, no matter how simple the building is or how easy it is to design, that an architect will be employed and will be paid a fee of 5 per cent, and, on the aggregate cost, it would be a very considerable item. The simplicity of the buildings is an argument for protecting the Government against excessive charges in that case.

Mr. ROBERTS. I desire to say to the gentleman from Texas that this item has been cut down very materially from the Department's estimates. The Department asked for the whole $430,000 necessary to complete the project, but in the economy exercised by the committee in its desire to keep the bill down as much as possible there was appropriated in this item only about enough to complete the purchase of the ground, so that very little of the $200,000 herein provided can, under any contingency, be used for buildings, and if the gentleman has in mind the placing of any restriction upon architects' fees, that will probably come along when the balance of the money is appropriated—perhaps in the next naval bill. The cost of the land will eat up nearly every dollar that is appropriated. Now, I would like to call the attention of the gentleman, in this connection, to the provision in the item just before, showing the character of the buildings, to a large extent, that go on these naval-magazine grounds. Under the head "Naval magazine, St. Juliens Creek, Norfolk, Va., one galvanized iron storehouse, $25,000." That is, to a large extent, the character of buildings that go on all these magazine sites.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Texas will have confidence in us, I think he may rely on the fact that there will be no extravagant architect fees here.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman will remember very well we paid a half a million dollars——

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. My dear friend, I do remember, and, furthermore, I wish you to give me credit for being among those who resisted it to the last. That was an everlasting extravagance, and since that time we have learned, and if the gentleman will have confidence in us he may depend upon it that there will be no extravagance in this particular.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I have every confidence in the gentleman, I will say, but I would like to see the limitation also written in the statute.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the word "architects," and I will state my reasons. The gentleman from Texas has pointed to one of the crying shames and evils of public buildings throughout the country. Not only did we pay about $500,000 for the architects' fees for the building of our naval buildings down here at Annapolis, but we had another shame to precede that here at the White House in building the little Executive Office, that has been described as looking like a "chicken coop." Outside architects designed it, New York architects designed it, the noted and distinguished Mr. McKim designed it, and the charge, I think, was 5 or 6 per cent on the immense amount of half a million dollars or more appropriated in making the improvements to the White House, this Executive Office, and overhauling the White House, and this architect and possibly others charged extra every time they changed the plans. Now, sir, after that, Mr. Chairman, I went to the Treasury Department and I found there a corps of architects employed on a salary who prepared the plans for our magnificent post-offices and custom-houses in the United States. They have just finished an annex to the magnificent post-office and custom-house at Nashville, and a more beautiful building is not in the South and possibly not in the United States, and yet we have to put a special provision in this bill here for outside architects to do this work. Why not let the architects who draw high salaries from the Government of the United States at the Treasury Department do this architectural work and save this money to the Government?

No man here, Mr. Chairman, dare defend the action of the architects about the White House either in the quality of work that they did or in the salary that was paid them, all of which was brought to the attention of the House; and now the distingished gentleman from Texas brings up another outrage, and the gentleman from Massachusetts says: The buildings are going to be very plain houses, little log cabins, I presume, little shanties, so to speak. Then why does not the gentleman take the Treasury architects to build them. Why do you want to go outside and put the Government to additional expense to get professional experts to build those little bits of houses? I am sure my friend is too big a man, too strong a man, and too broad a man to want to burden the Government with architectural fees, Mr. Chairman, to be paid to some architect in Boston or elsewhere. That is not his purpose, I hope, but we have got into slipshod ways here of putting in such provisions, and they go unchallenged, when the Government already has all the machinery, all the officers, and all the equipment to do this work that are necessary. I say it is an unnecessary waste, I say it is an oppression, and all that comes out of it is just such criticisms as the gentleman from Texas makes, and the gentleman even from Pennsylvania does not defend it. He says, "Trust us." We did "trust us" in rebuilding the White House. We did "trust us" in building the buildings at Annapolis, and now it is "trust us" on this the third proposition. Mr. Chairman, my motion is to strike out the word "architects," and then we will have the architects that are now in the employ of the Government to do the work, which means good work and no extra expense.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the Navy Department has no architect. The Treasury Department, I submit to the committee, can not build this building. They would not have the authority to do it. It is a magazine to be built by men connected with the Department of the Navy, and therefore we ask them to allow a design made for the building.

Mr. PERKINS. Does not the Architect of the Treasury Department take charge of all public buildings—the post-offices?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. They are under the Treasury. All public buildings except those belonging to the Army and Navy are under the Treasury Department.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move to strike out the last word.

The Indianapolis News has lately dropped into something which, while it may not be poetry; might be "verse," and as it is very closely germane to the question of the expenses of the Navy, and it consists of only two verses, I thought I would communicate it to the House. It reads as follows:

How dear to one's purse are the schedules of Dingley,
When statements of prices present them to view;
Those duties specific, together or singly,
Likewise ad valorem that's sometimes charged, too.
The wide-spreading net, and the haul that it brings in,
The dough that's so easy (the foreigner pays,
Of course, all this tax which a shrewd country rings in
On the untinkered tariff in dozens of ways).

How ardent we seized it on premises glowing,
E'en while we suspected in sleeves the trusts laughed.
So let's keep this measure, perfection o'erflowing—
The untinkered tariff—oh, ain't it the graft!
The good-thing old tariff, the trusty old tariff,
The untinkered tariff—oh, ain't it the graft!

Now, for fear, Mr. Chairman, that the verses may be attributed to me, as a good many other things are that I never was guilty of having written, I have stated it was written by the Indianapolis News, and I will further state that it was handed to me by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEALL], who may be called its sponsor in Congressional baptism. Thus I am in nowise responsible for it at all, except as a channel through which it is communicated to the House.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to call the attention of the House to the proviso on page 37, and while I do not propose to embarrass the committee in any way, or move to strike it out, I want to make my individual protest against that kind of legislation. We are asked to vote to authorize the sale of property concerning the value of which we know nothing, and we are asked to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to go ahead and build such buildings as he sees fit, construct them in any way he sees fit, to remodel and modernize them in any way that he sees fit, from an indefinite and unprescribed appropriation of which we know nothing, and then to take the balance of the money, if there is anything left from the sale, and give it away to the hospital fund of the Navy, contrary to all the practice, contrary to all the law that now exists with reference to appropriations. It seems to me that the proceeds of this property should be turned into the Treasury of the United States, and an appropriation made specifically for the purposes here contemplated.

I do not believe there is any individual Member of this House that would conduct his own business as loosely as that proviso would ask us to authorize the Government's business to be conducted, and I want to enter a protest against even being asked to vote for a proposition of that kind.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Chairman, I think the statement of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] is entitled to an explanation.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I think it needs one.

Mr. ROBERTS. And I am certain that had he known the facts, he never would have made the criticism which he has just given to the committee. Now, as a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, the land now being occupied in Chelsea—some 30 acres—as a naval magazine belongs not to the Government of the United States, and never did belong to it, but belongs to the naval-hospital fund. The title to that land, Mr. Chairman, was purchased out of money of this naval-hospital fund, and the Navy Department went on and took those 30 acres of land, without compensating the naval-hospital fund in the slightest degree, and used it for a magazine for some forty or fifty years. Now that a new magazine is to be established, the old one will be discontinued, and this proviso is made so that the Secretary of the Navy, having charge of that naval-hospital fund, may sell these 30 acres, and as much other of the 105 acres now in the naval-hospital site—which was all purchased out of the naval-hospital fund—as he sees fit, and the proceeds shall be used in modernizing the naval hospital there. The Surgeon-General of the Navy has been before the Naval Committee ever since I have been a member, asking an appropriation to make that naval hospital fit for the use of the sailors of our Navy, and the committee, in its wisdom, has seen fit to deny him the appropriation he asks. Now, here is an opportunity for the Surgeon-General of the Navy, out of property belonging to the hospital fund, to build, or, rather, modernize that hospital and bring it up to date.

I would like to state in this connection also that of this same tract of land—some 130 acres, originally purchased out of the naval-hospital fund; not out of the Treasury of the United States, mind you, but out of the fund contributed from the wages of the sailors of the United States Navy, which is a trust fund—that the Treasury Department, then having control of the Marine Hospital, purchased 15 acres of that land and paid for it, the money paid going into the naval-hospital fund; and that land is now being used for the Marine Hospital. So that it is not taking any money out of the Treasury of the United States or putting into the hospital fund the proceeds from land belonging to the United States, but merely giving the hospital fund what belongs to it.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I am very glad to hear the explanation the gentleman has made. I suppose, however, it may be reasonably inferred that during the time—thirty or forty years—the United States has occupied that land a very large amount of money has been expended by the Government. So that there certainly may be a joint ownership between the hospital fund and the Government itself. In any event, not caring who has the title to the land, I think the legislation is very loose.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Chairman, if the contention of the gentleman is correct, anybody who squats on somebody else's land and spends money on it becomes a joint owner in that land. Now, as a matter of fact, all the Government has spent on the naval-magazine site is a few thousand dollars for an old antiquated magazine which is to-day out of date, and that is the reason we are asking for a new naval magazine on that coast, because the present magazine is entirely inadequate for the service of the Navy.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, just a statement. The gentleman from Pennsylvania states that there are no architects in the Navy Department.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman proposes to strike out the word "architect."

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes; but I have no bill before me.

Mr. RIXEY. It is line 25, page 36.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It is line 25, page 36. Now, when I went up there to see about the work that they were doing at the White House or about the work to be done at home, the Architect of the Treasury stated to me that they prepared the plans for public buildings put up by the United States Government. Whether that would cover buildings done for the Navy any less than it does or did to buildings that are put up for the Treasury or the Post-Office Department, I do not know. But these architects are certainly there. They are paid a salary and ought to do this work.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Page 36, line 25, strike out the word "architect."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 11, noes 53.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois the propriety of moving that the committee do now rise. The gentleman will withdraw his point of order if the committee rises.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I will withdraw the point of order if the committee will rise.

Mr. FOSS. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRUMPACKER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the naval appropriation bill and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

SENATE.

SATURDAY, May 12, 1906.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. EDWARD E. HALE.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. KEAN, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Journal stands approved.

ESTATE OF ALFRED SWEARINGIN, DECEASED.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair invites the attention of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY]. However, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. FULTON], who objected to the proposed order yesterday, is not now in the Chamber.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, I should like to make a statement. I hoped the Senator from Oregon would come in. But that is an order in a case where the bill was sent to the Court of Claims. I know nothing on earth about the case, but the clerk of the Committee on Claims brought down this written order to me and said that it was necessary for me to introduce it, to meet the application of the Court of Claims. They have the bill before them, but the papers were not transmitted when the bill was sent down. This is simply a demand from the committee for the papers, and they can only be sent down on the order of the Senate. The committee discharged itself by sending down the bill, but did not send the papers. I presume if the Senator from Oregon were here he would have no objection to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi does not press the order now?

Mr. MONEY. I do not press it in the absence of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. KEAN. I do not think the chairman of the committee would object to it, but he did not exactly understand what it was. When he comes in I have no doubt he will withdraw his objection.

Mr. FULTON subsequently entered the Chamber.

Mr. MONEY. I ask now that the order be made I called for yesterday. I have explained it to the Senator from Oregon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi asks for the adoption of an order which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Ordered, That the Committee on Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 3355) for the relief of the estate of Alfred Swearingin, deceased, and that the Secretary of the Senate be directed to transmit the papers accompanying the same to the Court of Claims in accordance with the request.

Mr. FULTON. Last evening I objected to the consideration of the order, as I did not then fully understand it. I see now that it refers to papers relative to a case that is pending before the Court of Claims, and I withdraw my objection to the adoption of the order.

The order was agreed to.

LANDS IN NEW MEXICO.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting letters from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, together with the report on the sale of lands in New Mexico, and stating that Congress alone has the power to enforce the conditions of the grant to that Territory; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

FINDINGS OF THE COURT OF CLAIMS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a certified copy of the findings of fact filed by the court in the cause of The Trustees of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, of Oak Bowery, Ala., v. The United States; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a certified copy of the findings of fact filed by the court in the cause of The Trustees of the John Mann Methodist Church (Colored), of Winchester, Va., v. The United States; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

H. R. 18795. An act granting an increase of pension to James E. Raney;
H. R. 18821. An act granting an increase of pension to Eliza Jane Witherspoon;
H. R. 18822. An act granting an increase of pension to Sophie S. Parker;
H. R. 18862. An act granting an increase of pension to Joseph H. Weaver;
H. R. 18887. An act granting an increase of pension to Alexander W. Carruth;
H. R. 18910. An act granting an increase of pension to Philo E. Davis;
H. R. 18930. An act granting an increase of pension to Eliza J. Mays;
H. R. 18935. An act granting an increase of pension to Mima A. Boswell;
H. R. 18959. An act granting an increase of pension to Albert G. Packer;
H. R. 18966. An act granting a pension to John W. Ward;
H. R. 18976. An act granting an increase of pension to Nelson S. Preston;
H. R. 19001. An act granting an increase of pension to Elizabeth A. McKay; and
H. R. 19005. An act granting a pension to Gideon M. Burriss.

Subsequently, the foregoing pension bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

S. 2292. An act for the relief of certain entrymen and settlers within the limits of the Northern Pacific Railway land grant;
S. 4094. An act to amend section 4426 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, regulation of motor boats; and
H. R. 6101. An act for the relief of the estate of Charles M. Demarest, deceased.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SCOTT presented memorials of the Conductors' Association of West Virginia, of Grafton; of Link Division, No. 352, Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers of Martinsburg, and of sundry citizens of Charles Town, all in the State of West Virginia, remonstrating against the adoption of an amendment to the railway rate bill prohibiting the issuance of free transportation to the families of railway employees; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GALLINGER presented a memorial of the New England Hardware Dealers' Association, of Boston, Mass., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called "parcels-post bill;" which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. KEAN presented a petition of sundry citizens of Westfield, N. J., and the petition of R. D. Cann, of Plainfield, N. J., praying for the enactment of legislation to restrict immigration; which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented petitions of Sanford E. Cobb, of East Orange; of Thomas Fenton Taylor, of South Orange, and of the De Ronde-Osborn Company, of Englewood, all in the State of New Jersey, praying for the removal of the internal-revenue tax on denaturized alcohol; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Montclair, N. J., praying for the establishment of a national bureau in the Interior Department in behalf of the children of the country; which were referred to the Committee on Territories.

He also presented petitions of the Ladies' Auxiliary of the Home Missionary Society of the Roseville Methodist Episcopal Church, of Newark; of the congregation of the Monroe Avenue Methodist Episcopal Church, of Plainfield, and of sundry citizens, all in the State of New Jersey, praying that the direction of the schools of Alaska remain with the Bureau of Education, and also that the Bureau continue the control of the reindeer industry in that Territory; which were referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. RAYNER presented a petition of sundry citizens of Frederick, Md., praying for the removal of the internal-revenue tax on denaturized alcohol; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

WILLIAM PERSONS.

Mr. LODGE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3256) for the relief of William Persons, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

BRIDGE NEAR WHEELING, W. VA.

Mr. SCOTT. I introduce a bill, and ask for its present consideration.

The bill (S. 6146) to authorize the Back River Bridge Company to construct a bridge across the west or smaller division of the Ohio River from Wheeling Island, West Virginia, to the Ohio shore, was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Back River Bridge Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of West Virginia, its successors and assigns, be, and they are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto, for street railway and wagon traffic and other appropriate public uses, across the west or smaller channel of the Ohio River, known as the Back River, from a point near the southerly end of Wheeling Island, which is a part of the city of Wheeling, in the State of West Virginia, to the Ohio shore, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

Mr. KEAN. From what committee does the bill come?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is not reported from a committee, as the Chair understands.

Mr. KEAN. Is it a bill that has been just introduced?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill was introduced by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SCOTT].

Mr. SCOTT. And I ask unanimous consent for its consideration.

Mr. KEAN. I do not like to object to anything the Senator from West Virginia wants, but I think the bill should be considered in its regular order.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. KEAN. Certainly.

Mr. SCOTT. We have been passing bridge bills without having them referred. This bill was taken by me to the War Department yesterday, and the Chief Engineer recommends it; he said there would be no objection to it whatever. These people are waiting to construct a bridge over the Back River, that is not navigable; and it is a serious question whether it is necessary to have a bill passed at all in order to bridge it.

Mr. KEAN. I think we had better not pass the bill now. Let it take the regular course.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under objection, the bill will be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GALLINGER introduced a bill (S. 6147) authorizing changes in certain street railway tracks within the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. FRAZIER introduced a bill (S. 6148) granting an increase of pension to James S. Whitlock; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 6149) to change and fix the time for holding the circuit and district courts of the United States for the middle district of Tennessee; in the southern division of the eastern district of Tennessee at Chattanooga, and the northeastern division of the eastern district of Tennessee at Greeneville, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMENDMENT TO RAILROAD RATE BILL.

Mr. McCUMBER. I submit an amendment to the rate bill, which I ask may be read and lie on the table.

The amendment was read, and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. McCUMBER to the bill (H. R. 12987) entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission."

Insert after the word "dollars," in line 18 of page 4 of the reprint of sections 1, 2, 3, and 4, as amended by the Committee of the Whole, the following: "Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent such carrier from giving free or reduced transportation to any destitute or indigent sick, injured, or crippled person, or to laborers transported to any place to supply a demand for labor at such place, or to land or home seekers, or to the officers, agents, or employees, or members of the families of the officers, agents, or employees of such carrier, over the lines of railway operated by it."

IRRIGATION INVESTIGATIONS.

Mr. FRAZIER submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for irrigation and drainage investigations from $102,200 to $120,000, intended to be proposed by him to the agricultural appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and ordered to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—C. E. MOORE.

On motion of Mr. LONG, it was Ordered, That on the application of C. E. Moore he is authorized to withdraw from the files of the Senate all papers accompanying Senate bill No. 3027, Fifty-sixth Congress, first session, entitled "A bill for the relief of C. E. Moore," there having been no adverse report thereon.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 9238. An act for the relief of William Saphar was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed, and the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. CULBERSON. I understand that section 5 of the bill is now under consideration. On page 13, line 18, I move to amend by striking out the word "two"——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is an amendment pending.

Mr. CULBERSON. Then this amendment is not in order. I thought there was no amendment pending.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending amendment will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. On page 17, line 14, after the word "office," strike out the period and insert a comma, and insert the words:

And if the order or requirement has been made against two or more carriers then in the district where any one of said carriers has its principal operating office, and if the carrier has its principal operating office in the District of Columbia then the venue shall be in the district where said carrier has its principal office; and jurisdiction to hear and determine such suits is hereby vested in such courts.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I inquire what is the parliamentary status?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair was having the pending amendment stated.

Mr. NELSON. Is this an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] last evening?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. This is the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM]. To that an amendment has been offered by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER], which will now be stated by the Secretary. The Secretary will read the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland.

The SECRETARY. After the word "courts," the last word of the proposed amendment, add:

But such jurisdiction shall not attach unless the order complained of was beyond the authority of the Commission or in violation of the rights of the carrier secured by the Constitution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. CULBERSON. I dislike to ask it, but I would be glad to have the amendment to the amendment read again.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be again read at the request of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CULBERSON. Whose amendment is it?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The original amendment was proposed by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM]. The amendment to it is the one proposed by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER]. Does the Senator from Texas wish to have both the amendment and the amendment to the amendment read?

Mr. CULBERSON. We might as well have both restated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again read the amendment and the amendment to the amendment.

The Secretary again read the amendment and the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. ALDRICH. Is the amendment to the amendment the same amendment the Senate voted down yesterday?

Mr. RAYNER. No.

Mr. ALDRICH. It must be substantially the same. There may be a change of a word, or something of that kind.

Mr. RAYNER. It is not the same amendment. It is the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. LONG] submitted some weeks ago, and identical with the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. LONG. The Senator is very unfortunate in his understanding of the amendment he proposes. This is not the amendment that I proposed.

Mr. RAYNER. It is identical, and that is about as close as you can get.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. RAYNER. One moment, Mr. President——

Mr. CULBERSON. I desire to ask the Senator from Maryland what construction he puts on the word "authority" in his amendment? Does he believe that would give the courts a broad review in addition to passing upon the constitutionality of rates—that is to say, would it give the courts authority to pass upon whether or not the rate was in violation of the statute?

Mr. RAYNER. When I offered the amendment yesterday I used the word "jurisdiction," because I think the word "jurisdiction" is a better word than the word "authority." But, in my judgment, the word "authority" would refer to the statute and to nothing beyond—that is to say, if the Commission did not exceed its powers under the statute the act of the Commission would be lawful.

I have changed the word "jurisdiction" to the word "authority," because I have taken identically, word for word, the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, which he said he would vote for yesterday if I offered it. I repeat, I have taken it word for word.

Mr. CULBERSON. Will the Senator pardon another inquiry? I want to vote for his amendment if I can consistently with my views upon the question. I understand him to say now that the word "authority" would permit the court to pass upon the question as to whether the Commission had acted within the statute.

Mr. RAYNER. Yes.

Mr. CULBERSON. Would not that give them authority then to pass upon a question other than the constitutional question covered by the other phase of the amendment proposed?

Mr. RAYNER. I am perfectly willing to explain what I think the word "authority" means. If the Commission fixes a rate, I do not think the court would have the right to review the proposition whether the rate fixed by the Commission——

Mr. SPOONER. I want to hear the Senator from Maryland, but I can not hear him.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. SPOONER. I am not very far from him and can not hear him.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The difficulty seems to be in the Senator's neighborhood.

Mr. SPOONER. I am not responsible for that, except as addressing the Chair. I was absolutely silent.

Mr. RAYNER (to Mr. CULBERSON). Am I in your time or my own?

Mr. CULBERSON. I simply asked the Senator a question.

Mr. RAYNER. I will answer the question by stating that I think under the amendment of the Senator from Iowa the court would have the right to determine whether or not a rate fixed by the Commission was in accordance with the reasonable standard provided for by Congress. That is as concise as I can put it.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

Mr. RAYNER. Let me just finish this sentence. That to my mind draws the distinction between what is called the constitutional amendment and the statutory amendment. And I want to say right here, and it is the view I think has been running in the mind of the Senator from Pennsylvania all the time, that when the courts review the action of the Commission under the Allison amendment they have the right in every case to say whether or not the rate or the regulation or the practice fixed by the Commission was in accordance with the standard of reasonableness adopted by Congress. Now, when you use the word "jurisdiction," that, I think, prevents the court from considering that question, because the sole question under the head of jurisdiction would be whether or not the Commission had exceeded its powers as defined in the statute.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. RAYNER. I do.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Commission fixes a rate unreasonably and unjustly low, would it be within or without the authority conferred by the statute?

Mr. LONG. It was impossible to hear the Senator from Wisconsin in this part of the Chamber.

Mr. SPOONER. My question was, If the Commission fixes a rate unreasonably low, would it be within or without the authority conferred by the statute on the Commission?

Mr. RAYNER. In my judgment it would be absolutely within the law, and the court would have a right to review it under the Allison amendment, but not under the Long amendment I have now duplicated and offered.

If the Allison amendment was not here the courts would have no right to inquire into the question whether or not the rate fixed by the Commission was in accordance with the reasonable standard provided for by Congress. My whole argument is that under the Allison amendment you give the courts the power not to determine the constitutional question whether or not the property of a carrier had been taken without just compensation, but to inquire into the proposition in every case whether the rate fixed by the Commission, or the regulation or practice adopted by the Commission, was reasonable in accordance with the standard here legislated by Congress, and the two propositions are different.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Commission fixes a rate unreasonably low, would it not be a violation of the Constitution?

Mr. RAYNER. In what respect, I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin, unless it took the property of the carrier without just compensation?

Mr. SPOONER. If unreasonably low, would it be just compensation under the Constitution?

Mr. RAYNER. It may undoubtedly be unreasonably low, and still afford just compensation to the carrier. It may be unreasonably low so far as the carrier is concerned, and still not deprive the carrier of just compensation under the Constitution. There is a broad margin between those two propositions.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is what I was wondering about. I was very curious to hear what the Senator from Maryland would say in answer to the question of the Senator. I am awaiting his answer with great interest.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. NELSON. I rise to a point of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota will state his point of order.

Mr. NELSON. As I understand the situation, last night the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] offered an amendment, which was pending, and then the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] offered a substitute, or an amendment to that amendment. Those are the two propositions that are pending, and at this time the amendment of the Senator from Texas can not be in order. I call the attention of the Chair to page 6900 of the RECORD. So the question now is upon the amendment of the Senator from Maryland to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is as the Chair stated it. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland to the amendment.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President, I did not intend to make any remarks at all this morning.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator kindly allow me to offer an amendment to the pending bill, to be printed? I submit a proposed amendment, which need not be read. I ask that it be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. RAYNER. As I have said, I did not intend to make any further remarks this morning. I do not see that I accomplish anything, practically; but the question has been asked and I propose to answer it. I answer it in this way: I say that this present amendment opens up the whole case for a new trial in the courts. The first amendment submitted by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. LONG] only confers upon the court the right to try the question whether the property of the carrier has been taken without just compensation or whether the Commission has exceeded its jurisdiction or authority. I have used the words "jurisdiction" and "authority" interchangeably. I like the word "jurisdiction" much better, but I am inclined to think "authority" answers the same purpose.

Now, I want to answer the question of the Senator from Wisconsin by a practical illustration. Suppose the Commission fixed the rate between Baltimore and Washington. We will say the rate now is a dollar. Suppose it fixed the rate at 90 cents. That would be unreasonably low by comparison; and the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad could show, perhaps, that the rate of 90 cents or 80 cents would be unreasonably low, because the comparison is the test. The Supreme Court has held that comparison is the best test. But it would be impossible for the railroad to show that the rate of 90 cents has taken its property without just compensation, within the meaning of the fifth amendment. It could not possibly do it. Under the first amendment of the Senator from Kansas, which I am in favor of, it would be compelled to do it. Under this amendment, which confers upon the court the jurisdiction to suspend, to set aside or annul any rate, a carrier would have a right to show that that rate is unreasonably low. That is the distinction between the two propositions.

I wanted to say this yesterday, if I had had time, that this proposition opens the courts to the whole inquiry that is before the Commission, and the constitutional review only opens the court to the proposition whether or not the property of the carrier has been taken without just compensation. Let me read you what this review opens the courts to. Of course, if any Senator can not see any distinction between these two propositions, it is not my fault—the distinction between a rate that is unreasonably low between a carrier and a shipper, and a rate that takes away the property of the carrier without just compensation.

Let me read to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] what the court will inquire into in an action where the whole case goes into court, as it does under the Allison amendment. I read from a text writer upon this subject—from the "Annotated Interstate Commerce Act and Federal Anti-Trust Laws," by Snyder. It is a very valuable book. Here is the proposition that the court will inquire into:

> First, amount of through and local business; bonded debt; bulk; character of commodity; comparison of rates; cost of service; distance; former rates; geographical situation; return loads; special train service; value of freight; weight—

And a dozen other propositions that this text writer has given, that the court inquires into when the whole case goes before the court as it does under the present law.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me a question?

Mr. RAYNER. I have only fifteen minutes, and as the Senator from Minnesota will have fifteen minutes of his own time I hope he will allow me to proceed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maryland declines to yield.

Mr. RAYNER. How much time have I remaining? It is impossible with these interruptions to tell.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator has one minute and a half more.

Mr. RAYNER. I do not think I have spoken thirteen and a half minutes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maryland took the floor at 11 o'clock and 15 minutes, according to the record of the Secretary. The Chair will state for the benefit of Senators that the time consumed by interruptions is deducted from the fifteen minutes. A Senator has it within his own power to control his time absolutely by objecting to interruptions.

Mr. RAYNER. The first part of these remarks was taken up in answering the Senator from Texas, who asked me a question in his own time.

Mr. ALDRICH. Oh, no.

Mr. RAYNER. I was not on the floor. Now, I want to state to the Senator from Rhode Island that I will get the fifteen minutes, and I will answer the question before this amendment is voted on.

Mr. ALDRICH. I hope the Senator will.

Mr. RAYNER. I will get the floor if I want it, and I will answer the question. The Senator from Rhode Island seems to be in a great hurry now, though in the last four or five weeks he was in favor of delaying this bill. Now when we have this pivotal matter before us he wants to rush it through; but I will try to prevent it with all the zeal I can and whatever ability I have if I desire to obtain the floor again.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] is not the amendment that I proposed some weeks since and had printed. As I stated yesterday, I believe that the action of the courts would be the same under the amendment which I proposed as under the amendment of the Senator from Iowa. Under both these amendments or without any amendment to the House bill as to a court review, the question would be presented whether under section 4 of this bill, which amends section 15 of the present law, the courts would review and revise the discretion of the Commission. That section is the foundation stone of this legislation. Certain powers and duties are imposed upon the Interstate Commerce Commission. It is empowered to determine and prescribe a rate which in its judgment is just and reasonable. Discretion is lodged by Congress in the Commission by these words, and that being the case, under the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, under my amendment, or under the House bill without any amendment, the following propositions sustained by the decisions of the Supreme Court are applicable:

First. As a general rule when Congress confides to a public officer or tribunal the performance of a specific duty which requires the exercise of discretion and judgment, the finding of the officer or tribunal upon the facts presented is conclusive, and while subject to judicial review, the finding or judgment will not be disturbed by the courts unless there is a statutory provision which shows that Congress intended the courts to consider all the facts and revise the judgment or discretion of the officer or tribunal.

This doctrine is so firmly established by the decisions of the Supreme Court that it is hardly necessary to refer to cases. It was announced by Justice Story in the United States circuit court in the case of Allen v. Blunt (3 Story, 745), in which he said:

> In short, it may be laid down as a general rule that where a particular authority is confided to a public officer to be exercised by him in his discretion upon an examination of facts, of which he is made the appropriate judge, his decision upon these facts is, in the absence of any controlling provisions, absolutely conclusive as to the existence of those facts.

The above decision was rendered in 1845, and was followed by the Supreme Court, and quoted with approval in United States v. Wright (11 Wallace, 650), in which the court, speaking of the authority of the Postmaster-General to conclusively determine a matter that had been confided to him by Congress, said:

> Congress constituted him the sole judge to determine not only whether the exigencies in the case had arisen, but, if they had, the manner and extent of the allowance, and it is not competent for court or jury to revise his decision, nor is it reexaminable anywhere else, as there is no provision in the law to that effect.

The leading case which has been cited or referred to in all other cases since decided was that of Murray's Lessee v. Hoboken (18 Howard, 284), handed down in 1855, in which Justice Curtis, speaking for the court, said:

> To avoid misconstruction upon so grave a subject, we think it proper to state that we do not consider Congress can either withdraw from judicial cognizance any matter which, from its nature, is the subject of a suit at the common law, or in equity, or admiralty; nor, on the other hand, can it bring under the judicial power a matter which, from its nature, is not a subject for judicial determination. At the same time there are matters, involving public rights, which may be presented in such form that the judicial power is capable of acting on them, and which are susceptible of judicial determination, but which Congress may or may not bring within the cognizance of the courts of the United States, as it may deem proper. Equitable claims to land by the inhabitants of ceded territories form a striking instance of such a class of cases; and as it depends upon the will of Congress whether a remedy in the courts shall be allowed at all, in such cases, they may regulate it and prescribe such rules of determination as they may think just and needful. Thus it has been repeatedly decided in this class of cases, that upon their trial the acts of executive officers, done under the authority of Congress, were conclusive, either upon particular facts involved in the inquiry or upon the whole title. (Foley v. Harrison, 15 How., 433; Burgess v. Gray, 16 How., 48; ——— v. The Minnesota Mining Company at the present term.)
> It is true, also, that even in a suit between private persons to try a question of private right, the action of the executive power, upon a matter committed to its determination by the Constitution and laws, is conclusive. (Luther v. Borden, 7 How., 1; Doc v. Braden, 16 How., 635.)

In the above case it was clearly decided that there were matters involving public rights which Congress may or may not bring within the cognizance of the courts of the United States, as it may deem proper; that it depends upon the will of Congress whether a remedy in the courts will be allowed at all, and that Congress may regulate it and prescribe such rules as it may deem just and needful. The court clearly states that, in this class of cases, the acts of executive officers, done under the authority of Congress, were conclusive.

In Nishimura v. United States (142 U. S., 660), Justice Gray announced the same doctrine and used the following language:

> And Congress may, if it sees fit, as in the statutes in question in United States v. Jung Ah Lung, just cited, authorize the courts to investigate and ascertain the facts on which the right to land depends. But, on the other hand, the final determination of those facts may be entrusted by Congress to executive officers; and in such a case, as in all others, in which a statute gives a discretionary power to an officer, to be exercised by him upon his own opinion of certain facts, he is made the sole and exclusive judge of the existence of those facts, and no other tribunal, unless expressly authorized by law to do so, is at liberty to reexamine or controvert the sufficiency of the evidence on which he acted. (Martin v. Mott, 12 Wheat., 19, 31; Philadelphia and Trenton Railroad v. Stimpson, 14 Pet., 448, 458; Benson v. McMahon, 127 U. S., 457; In re Oteiza, 136 U. S., 330.)

It will be observed that Justice Gray made the same distinction that had been made by Justice Curtis in the previous case, and stated that Congress might, if it saw fit, authorize the courts to investigate and ascertain the facts upon which the right to admission into the United States depends. But, on the other hand, Congress might intrust the final determination of those facts to executive officers, and that in such a case, as in all others, in which a statute gives discretionary power to an officer to be exercised by him upon his own opinion of certain facts, he is made the sole and exclusive judge of the existence of those facts, and no other tribunal, unless expressly authorized by law to do so, is at liberty to reexamine or controvert the sufficiency of the evidence on which he acted.

In Fong Yue Ting v. United States (149 U. S., 712) Justice Gray reaffirmed the same doctrine, and stated that the power to exclude aliens is regulated by treaty or act of Congress, and the duty being imposed upon the Executive the judicial department would not interfere unless authorized by treaty or by statute, or unless required to do so by the paramount law of the Constitution.

In Lem Moon Sing v. United States (158 U. S., 546) Justice Harlan, for the court, said:

> The remedy of the appellant was by appeal to the Secretary of the Treasury from the decision of his subordinate, and not to the courts. If the act of 1894 had done nothing more than appropriate money to enforce the Chinese-exclusion act, the courts would have been authorized to protect any right the appellant had to enter the country if he was of the class entitled to admission under existing laws or treaties, and was improperly excluded. But when Congress went further, and declared that in every case of an alien excluded by the decision of the appropriate immigration or customs officers "from admission into the United States under any law or treaty," such decision should be final, unless reversed by the Secretary of the Treasury, the authority of the courts to review the decision of the executive officers was taken away. (United States v. Rogers, 65 Fed. Rep., 787.) If the act of 1894, thus construed, takes away from the alien appellant any right given by previous laws or treaties to reenter the country, the authority of Congress to do even that can not be questioned, although it is the duty of the courts not to construe an act of Congress as modifying or annulling a treaty made with another nation, unless its words clearly and plainly point to such a construction.

It will be seen that the above case follows the same doctrine of the previous cases, holding that Congress had the power to determine the procedure for the exclusion of aliens. Under acts previous to that of 1894 the courts had been authorized to investigate the facts and determine certain questions. But in the act of 1894 Congress said that the decision of the immigration officer was final, unless reversed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Supreme Court decided that the authority to review the decisions of the executive officers was taken away by this act. In the same case the court decided that as the question had been constitutionally committed by Congress to officers of the Executive Department that their determination was final.

In Travelers' Insurance Company v. Connecticut (185 U. S., 371), Justice Brewer, for the court, said that the courts are not authorized to substitute their views for those of the legislature in a taxation case.

In Japanese Immigration case (189 U. S., 97) Justice Harlan, for the court, said:

> The constitutionality of the legislation in question, in its general aspects, is no longer open to discussion in this court. That Congress may exclude aliens of a particular race from the United States; prescribe the terms and conditions upon which certain classes of aliens may come to this country; establish regulations for sending out of the country such aliens as come here in violation of law; and commit the enforcement of such provisions, conditions, and regulations exclusively to executive officers, without judicial intervention, are principles firmly established by the decisions of this court. (Nishimura Ekiu v. United States, 142 U. S., 651; Fong Yue Ting v. United States, 149 U. S., 698; Lem Moon Sing v. United States, 158 U. S., 538; Wong Wing v. United States, 163 U. S., 228; Fok Yung Yo v. United States, 185 U. S., 296, 305.)

It will be observed that in this case the power of Congress to commit the enforcement of the exclusion laws to executive officers, without judicial intervention, was considered to be firmly established. To the same effect is the case of Riverside Oil Company v. Hitchcock (194 U. S., 324), in which Justice Peckham, for the court, announced the doctrine that neither injunction nor mandamus would lie against an officer of the land deparment to control him in discharging an official duty which required the exercise of his judgment and discretion. Speaking of the Secretary of the Interior, to whom had been committed the duty of deciding certain questions, Justice Peckham said:

> Whether he decided right or wrong, is not the question. Having jurisdiction to decide at all, he had necessarily jurisdiction, and it was his duty to decide as he thought the law was, and the courts have no power whatever under those circumstances to review his determination by a mandamus or injunction. The court has no general supervisory power over the officers of the land department, by which to control their decision upon questions within their jurisdiction. If this writ were granted we would require the Secretary of the Interior to repudiate and disaffirm a decision which he regarded it his duty to make in the exercise of that judgment which is reposed in him by law, and we should require him to come to a determination upon the issues involved directly opposite to that which he had reached, and which the law conferred upon him the jurisdiction to make. Mandamus has never been regarded as the proper writ to control the judgment and discretion of an officer as to the decision of a matter which the law gave him power and imposed upon him the duty to decide for himself. The writ never can be used as a substitute for a writ of error. Nor does the fact that no writ of error will lie in such a case as this, by which to review the judgment of the Secretary, furnish any foundation for the claim that mandamus may therefore be awarded. The responsibility as well as the power rests with the Secretary, uncontrolled by the courts.

Justice Brown, in Bates v. Payne (194 U. S., 108), for the court, announced the same rule in the following language:

> But there is another class of cases in which the rule is somewhat differently, and perhaps more broadly, stated, and that is, that where Congress has committed to the head of a Department certain duties requiring the exercise of judgment and discretion, his action thereon, whether it involve questions of law or fact, will not be reviewed by the courts, unless he has exceeded his authority or this court should be of opinion that his action was clearly wrong.

He further said:

> The rule upon this subject may be summarized as follows: That where the decision of questions of fact is committed by Congress to the judgment and discretion of the head of a Department, his decision thereon is conclusive; and that even upon mixed questions of law and fact, or of law alone, his action will carry with it a strong presumption of its correctness, and the courts will not ordinarily review it, although they may have the power, and will occasionally exercise the right of so doing.

In the Public Clearing House v. Coyne (194 U. S., 508) Justice Brown, in delivering the opinion of the court, stated that most of the matters presented to the Departments required for their solution the judgment or discretion of the head of the Department, and in many cases, notably those connected with the disposition of the public lands, the action of the Department is accepted and followed by the courts, and even when involving questions of law there is a strong presumption of its correctness.

In United States v. Ju Toy (198 U. S., 263) Justice Holmes, delivering the opinion of the court, said that even though the Fifth Amendment did apply to one seeking entrance to this country, and to deny him admission may deprive him of liberty, yet due process of law does not necessarily require a judicial trial, and Congress may intrust the decision of his right to enter to an executive officer, whose decision in the matter is final and not subject to review by the courts.

In the case of Pittsburg Railway Company v. Backus (154 U. S., 434) Justice Brewer, for the court, stated the rule in the following language:

> Whenever a question of fact is thus submitted to the determination of a special tribunal, its decision creates something more than a mere presumption of fact, and if such determination comes into inquiry before the courts it can not be overthrown by evidence going only to show that the fact was otherwise than as so found and determined.

In order that the determination of an executive officer upon an investigation made of certain facts on a subject committed by Congress to the determination of that officer shall be conclusive, the words of the statute must show that it was the intention of Congress to leave the determination of the question to the judgment or discretion of the officer or board.

In section 3929 of the Revised Statutes, being the statute authorizing the Postmaster-General to close the mails to lotteries, gift enterprises, etc., the statute says:

> The Postmaster-General may, upon evidence satisfactory to him that any person is engaged in conducting any fraudulent lottery, etc.

In the case of Buttfield v. Stranahan (192 U. S., 470) the act of March 2, 1897, in relation to tea, was sustained. By section 3 of that act the Secretary of the Treasury, upon the recommendation of a board that he was to appoint, was authorized to fix and establish uniform standards of purity, quality, and fitness for consumption of all kinds of teas imported into the United States, etc., and it provided that all teas or merchandise described as teas of inferior quality and fitness for consumption to such standard, should be deemed to be within the prohibition of the section of the act which provided that all teas which were inferior to certain standards should not be imported.

In the case of Field v. Clark (143 U. S., 680) section 3 of the act of October 1, 1890, was sustained, and by that act the President was authorized to suspend the free introduction of certain articles into the United States and impose certain duties upon them when the President shall be satisfied that a foreign government imposes duties on our products which he may deem to be reciprocally unequal and unreasonable.

In all these acts which have been sustained as not conferring legislative power, words are used which clearly show the intention of Congress to lodge in the executive officer discretion and the power to use his judgment in the decision of certain facts.

In section 4 of this bill authority is given to the Interstate Commerce Commission, when it shall be of the opinion that rates made by a carrier are unjust and unreasonable, to determine and prescribe what shall in its judgment be a just, reasonable rate, to be thereafter observed as a maximum to be charged. These words clearly show the intent of Congress to confer upon the Commission a discretion in determining what are just and reasonable rates, and these words, or language of the same import, are necessary in order that the power conferred upon the Commission shall be of any substantial worth.

In construing the present interstate-commerce law the Supreme Court, under the statute providing that the findings of the Commission are to be taken as prima facie evidence in court, has decided it is the duty of the Commission to investigate the facts, and then the court will give great weight to the findings of the Commission, and will not set them aside except in cases where they were clearly wrong.

In the case of Texas and Pacific Railway v. Interstate Commerce Commission (162 U. S., 238) Justice Shiras, in delivering the opinion of the court, said:

> The defendant was entitled to have its defence considered, in the first instance at least, by the Commission upon a full consideration of all the circumstances and conditions upon which a legitimate order could be founded. The questions whether certain charges were reasonable or otherwise, whether certain discriminations were due or undue, were questions of fact, to be passed upon by the Commission in the light of all facts duly alleged and supported by competent evidence, and it did not comport with the true scheme of the statute that the circuit court of appeals should undertake, of its own motion, to find and pass upon such questions of fact, in a case in the position in which the present one was.

We do not, of course, mean to imply that the Commission may not directly institute proceedings in a circuit court of the United States charging a common carrier with disregard of provisions of the act, and that thus it may become the duty of the court to try the case in the first instance. Nor can it be denied that, even when a petition is filed by the Commission for the purpose of enforcing an order of its own, the court is authorized to "hear and determine the matter as a court of equity," which necessarily implies that the court is not concluded by the findings or conclusions of the Commission; yet as the act provides that, on such hearing, the findings of fact in the report of said Commission shall be prima facie evidence of the matters therein stated, we think it plain that if, in such a case, the Commission has failed in its proceedings to give notice to the alleged offender, or has unduly restricted its inquiries upon a mistaken view of the law, the court ought not to accept the findings of the Commission as a legal basis for its own action, but should either inquire into the facts on its own account, or send the case back to the Commission to be lawfully proceeded in.

In the case of the Louisville Railroad Company v. Behlmer (175 U. S., 675), Justice White in delivering the opinion of the court said:

If, then, we were to undertake the duty of weighing the evidence, in this record, we would be called upon, as a matter of original action, to investigate all these serious considerations which were shut out from view by the Commission, and were not weighed by the circuit court of appeals, because both the Commission and the court erroneously construed the statute. But the law attributes prima facie effect to the findings of fact made by the Commission, and that body, from the nature of its organization and the duties imposed upon it by the statute, is peculiarly competent to pass upon questions of fact of the character here arising.

In the case of East Tennessee Railway Company v. Interstate Commerce Commission (181 U. S. 27), Justice White, in delivering the opinion of the court, said:

To state these issues is at once to demonstrate that their decision, as a matter of first impression, properly belonged to the Commission, since upon that body the law has specially imposed the duty of considering them. Whilst the court has in the discharge of its duty been at times constrained to correct erroneous constructions which have been put by the Commission upon the statute, it has steadily refused, because of the fact just stated, to assume to exert its original judgment of the facts, where, under the statute, it was entitled, before approaching the facts, to the aid which must necessarily be afforded by the previous enlightened judgment of the Commission upon such subjects.

These decisions are under the present statute in which the Commission is not given authority to determine and prescribe a reasonable maximum rate to take the place of one that it condemns. This bill imposes that duty upon the Commission, and under the decisions above quoted I believe the courts will follow the rule above referred to.

Second. It must not be inferred that the courts can not review or set aside determinations of officers or tribunals to which Congress has confided certain duties. Their action or determinaton is always set aside when they act beyond the authority of the law which authorized them to act at all.

It is scarcely necessary to refer to authorities to support the above proposition. The jurisdiction of such subordinate tribunals is, of necessity, limited and they can only act within the scope of the authority given them by Congress. One of the latest cases decided by the Supreme Court is that of School of Magnetic Healing v. McAnnulty (187 U. S., 108), in which Justice Peckham discussed the limitations under which an executive officer acts, to whom Congress committed a certain duty. He said:

That the conduct of the Post-Office is a part of the administrative department of the Government is entirely true, but that does not necessarily and always oust the courts of jurisdiction to grant relief to a party aggrieved by any action by the head or one of the subordinate officials of that department which is unauthorized by the statute under which he assumes to act. The acts of all its officers must be justified by some law, and in case an official violates the law to the injury of an individual the courts generally have jurisdiction to grant relief.

The land department of the United States is administrative in its character, and it has been frequently held by this court that, in the administration of the public-land system of the United States, questions of fact are for the consideration and judgment of the land department, and its judgment thereon is final. (Burfenning v. Chicago, etc., Railway Company, 163 U. S., 321; Johnson v. Drew, 171 U. S., 93, 99; Gardner v. Bonestell, 180 U. S., 362.)

While the analogy between the above-cited cases and the one now before us is not perfect, yet even in them it is held that the decisions of the officers of the department upon questions of law do not conclude the courts, and they have power to grant relief to an individual aggrieved by an erroneous decision of a legal question by department officers.

He further said:

The facts, which are here admitted of record, show that the case is not one which by any construction of those facts is covered or provided for by the statutes under which the Postmaster-General has assumed to act, and his determination that those admitted facts do authorize his action is a clear mistake of law as applied to the admitted facts, and the courts, therefore, must have power in a proper proceeding to grant relief. Otherwise, the individual is left to the absolutely uncontrolled and arbitrary action of a public and administrative officer, whose action is unauthorized by any law and is in violation of the rights of the individual. Where the action of such an officer is thus unauthorized he thereby violates the property rights of the person whose letters are withheld.

The above case establishes the doctrine that where an executive officer is authorized by Congress to perform an administrative function, that his acts, beyond the scope of his authority, are void, and if he misconstrues the law relief may be had by injunction in the courts to restrain his illegal and unauthorized acts.

In the case of Public Clearing House v. Coyne (194 U. S., 508) Justice Brown, in construing the McAnnulty case above referred to, stated that the constitutionality of a law authorizing the Postmaster-General to make seizure of certain kinds of mail was assumed, the only reservation being that the person injured may apply to the courts for redress in case the Postmaster-General has exceeded his authority, or his action is palpably wrong. Many more cases might be cited, showing that while the courts will not review or revise the discretion of an officer to whom Congress confided certain duties, yet when that officer exceeded his authority or acts without warrant of law, his illegal acts will be restrained by the courts.

In the Reagan case (154 U. S., 362), to which I referred yesterday, there was an examination of the justness and reasonableness of rates made by the Texas commission, but only to ascertain whether any constitutional right of the carrier had been invaded or the commission had exceeded its authority. The railroad law of Texas has the broadest kind of review. It was construed by the supreme court of that State in The Railroad Commission case (90 Texas, 363) as imposing the duty upon the court to examine into the whole question irrespective of the finding of the commission. Yet the Supreme Court of the United States in considering an order of the Texas commission confined itself to the question as to whether or not the rates were so low as not to give the carrier a fair return on the property that was employed in the service.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. LONG. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. Before the Senator from Kansas passes from the Reagan case, I call his attention to the fact that, as I understand the law, he states that case too broadly when he says that it permits a broad review as to whether a rate is just or reasonable. If he will turn to that case and examine it, especially the statement——

Mr. LONG. I can not hear what the Senator says.

Mr. CULBERSON. If the Senator will turn to the statement of that case, which contains the law on the subject, he will find that there is an absolute prohibition against an examination of the justness of the rate as between the individual shipper and the carrier. The statute, in the second place, provides that in a single suit brought by a railroad company against the railroad commission of Texas the reasonableness of the rates may be inquired into. To that extent it is a broad review, and it does not permit any inquiry at all into the reasonableness of the rate as between the individual shipper and the carrier.

Mr. LONG. It permits the carrier in a suit that it may bring against the Commission to show that the rates or charges complained of are unreasonable and unjust to it or to them, and that is the whole question. It permits them to do this independently of what the finding of the Commission may have been.

In the Railway Commission case (90 Tex., 363), the court said:

It is true that the courts have established the rule that the reasonableness and justice of rates fixed by the legislature, or by a commission empowered by it so to do, are ordinarily questions committed to the discretion of those bodies and not subject to revision by the courts, but in such cases the law did not authorize any revision of such action by the judicial department.

This case was followed in Railway Commission case (96 Texas, 394).

Third. The Supreme Court has decided that when a rate made by legislative authority, either by the legislature direct or through the assistance of a commission, is challenged in court, that the court will only inquire into the question whether the rate is so low as not to afford a fair return on the property employed in performing the service. The decision of the commission is final on all questions, except when constitutional rights are involved or when the commission acts beyond the authority of the law.

A trial before a board or executive officer has been determined to be due process of law when Congress has committed to such an officer a certain duty to perform according to his judgment, but it is not due process of law when the question of a rate made by legislative authority is under consideration. In such a case due process of law means a trial in a court of justice, and was so decided in the Minnesota Milk case (134 U. S., 459). In that case the constitutional rights of the carrier were invaded, and the court decided that it was entitled to a hearing in a court of justice on the determination of those questions, but it has never decided that without special statutory authority a court will review the justness and reasonableness of rates made by a commission. In determining whether a rate is just and reasonable a great many elements are taken into consideration by the carrier or by a commission in making a rate. The questions of wisdom and policy are involved, and these questions will not be reviewed by the court.

The court will, without any special authority by statute, inquire whether a rate made by Congress direct, or through the assistance of a commission, is so high as to be extortionate to the shipper, or so low as to be confiscatory to the carrier.

Justice Brewer, while judge of the United States circuit court, in the Chicago Northwestern Railway Company v. Dey (35 Fed. Rep., 874), laid down the following rule for judicial interference of rates made by legislative authority. He said:

> It is obvious from these last quotations that the mere fact that the legislature has pursued the forms of law in prescribing a schedule of rates does not prevent inquiry by the courts, and the question is open, and must be decided in each case, whether the rates prescribed are within the limits of legislative power, or mere proceedings which, in the end, if not restrained, will work a confiscation of the property of complainant. Of course, some rule must exist, fixed and definite, to control the action of the courts, for it can not be that a chancellor is at liberty to substitute his discretion as to the reasonableness of rates for that of the legislature. The legislature has the discretion, and the general rule is that where any officer or board has discretion, its acts within the limits of that discretion are not subject to review by the courts.

The following extracts from Walter C. Noyes's book on American Railroad Rates, pages 211, 212, and 213, agree with the above opinion of Judge Brewer:

> The standard of reasonableness applied by the courts in determining the validity of a schedule of rates prescribed by legislative authority is essentially different from that considered in a controversy between a shipper and the railroad. As we have seen, the courts, under the common law, have power to pass upon the reasonableness of the charges of common carriers. In determining the question of reasonableness, the courts must consider all the factors entering into the rate. They may substitute their judgment of a just and proper charge for that of the carrier. But the courts can not substitute their judgment of a reasonable rate in place of that of the legislature or the legislature's subordinate body. The act of the legislature in fixing a rate is a law that such shall be the rate. The courts can no more question its expediency or propriety than in the case of any other law. It is immaterial whether they think, under all the circumstances, that it should have been greater or less. The courts have nothing to do with legislative-made rates except to determine whether they violate constitutional provisions. The inquiry is whether the rates prescribed by law are so unreasonably low as to infringe the property rights of the railroad. The duty of the courts is to determine whether the rates are confiscatory, not whether they are fair between shipper and carrier. * * * And it makes no difference that the statute empowering the Commission to act provides that rates shall be reasonable and just. This is a general rule for the Commission, but the discretion to be exercised in determining what rates are reasonable and just is the discretion of the Commission upon which the discretionary power has been conferred, and not of the courts upon which the power has not been conferred.

If the decision of the Commission is not to be final on such questions, why have a commission at all? If Congress imposes the duty upon the Commission of ascertaining what is a just and reasonable rate, then its decisions should be conclusive, unless it makes a rate that compels the carrier to perform a service without a fair return on the property employed in the service. It is the question of an adequate and fair return that the courts will inquire into, and upon which the determination of the Commission is not final. On all other questions before the Commission its decisions should be final and conclusive, as they will be, unless we place in this bill a provision authorizing the courts to review the justness and reasonableness of the rate fixed, aside from the constitutional question as to whether it affords a fair return, and then, I believe, the courts would not perform that duty, but possibly declare the whole act void.

I see no need of a commission if all of its acts are to be subject to be set aside by the courts. The court will not inquire into the whole case and try it de novo, unless there is special statutory authority to do so, and it will not review or revise the discretion of the Commission or set aside its orders unless the rate fixed is so low as not to afford a fair return on the property employed in the service. This is a judicial function that we can not and should not attempt to take away from the courts. The inquiry before the Commission on this point is not due process of law, but this question must be tried in a court. If the Commission fixes a rate so low that it does not afford a fair return, then it would be taking the property of the carrier without due process of law to put the rate immediately into effect and keep it in effect until the final hearing of the case. If the rate is fixed so low by the Commission that it does not afford a fair return on the property employed, the carrier can not be compelled to accept such a rate for a single day, and Congress can not take from the courts the power to grant a carrier immediate relief under such circumstances. If a carrier can demand a trial in court on this question of a fair return and prevent the Commission from permanently taking his property, it can not be prevented from having the right to prevent the temporary taking of his property unless there has been a trial of this question in a court where due process of law can be secured.

On the constitutional question as to whether the rate affords a fair return on the property employed, the hearing before the Commission is not due process of law, and the rate can not be enforced for a single day unless it affords a fair return on the property employed.

The constitutionality of State statutes authorizing the fixing of rates by a commission was sustained in the two leading cases, the Railroad Commission case (116 U. S., 307) and the Reagan case (154 U. S., 362). Justice Brewer, in the Maximum Rate case (167 U. S., 479), said:

> Congress might itself prescribe the rates, or it might commit to some subordinate tribunal this duty.

That this is not a delegation of legislative power is shown by the cases of Field v. Clark (143 U. S., 680) and Buttfield v. Stranahan (192 U. S., 496). If Congress can not fix rates through the instrumentality of a commission it can not be done at all. Congress can provide that rates shall be just and reasonable and then leave to a commission the duty of ascertaining the facts and fixing the rate according to this standard. As was said by Justice White in the Stranahan case:

> Congress legislated on the subject as far as was reasonably practicable, and from the necessities of the case was compelled to leave to executive officials the duty of bringing about the result pointed out by the statute. To deny the power of Congress to delegate such a duty would, in effect, amount but to declaring that the plenary power vested in Congress to regulate foreign commerce could not be efficaciously exerted.

If Congress can not fix rates in the manner prescribed in this bill, then the only other course to be pursued is to delegate to a commission the power to fix just and reasonable rates and then report its proceedings to Congress for approval.

This would not be practicable, for Congress could not approve every rate fixed by the Commission, and its approval would generally be of but little value on account of lack of definite information. Justice Brewer, in the recent Michigan tax case, said that the duty of local assessors was to act according to their judgments in respect to local taxes committed to their charge. That when they had finished their action, it must be assumed to have been taken in a conscientious discharge of the duties assumed. If the legislature should be convened after they had finished their action, and approve their acts, no question could be raised as to its validity. He asks the question whether it is any the less a legislative determination that the legislature assumes that the various local officials will discharge their duties honestly and fairly. He asks why is it necessary that the legislature be convened to add its formal approval of the integrity of the action of the local officers. So in this case, it may be assumed that when Congress fixes the standard of rates—something that must be just and reasonable—and then confides to a commission the duty of ascertaining the facts and applying the standard, it must be assumed that the commission will exercise an honest judgment and discretion, and that judgment will not be revised or reviewed by the courts if the commission acts within the scope of its authority and does not fix a maximum rate that is so low that it does not afford a fair return on the property employed. If the commission acts beyond the scope of its authority under the law or fixes a rate that does not afford just compensation, then the courts will restrain its action at the suit of anyone that has been injured by its orders.

The bill under consideration, either with or without the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], does not prevent a court from inquiring into the question whether an order made by the Commission takes the property of the carrier or the shipper without just compensation. It recognizes the right of review in the courts, but does not enlarge or restrict the present jurisdiction of the court. Unless this jurisdiction is enlarged by an amendment, the courts will only consider whether the Commission acted within the authority of the law or whether the rate is so high as to take the property of the shipper, or so low as to take the property of the carrier, without just compensation. The courts will not attempt to decide whether the rate is just and reasonable as between the shipper and the carrier. They will only determine the question of just compensation. If Congress confides to the Commission the duty of making a rate that is just and reasonable as between the shipper and carrier, in performing that duty the Commission must exercise its discretion and judgment. If it does not abuse its discretion and makes a rate that is so high that it takes the property of the shipper or so low that it takes the property of the carrier without just compensation, then the courts will not disturb the rate on review, unless there is a provision placed in this bill authorizing the courts to ascertain whether the rate is just and reasonable. If this is done and the courts assume this duty, then there is no necessity for having the Commission fix the rate. If they do not assume it, then the whole law may be declared invalid. Section 15, of the bill, as it passed the House, provides that when, in the opinion of the Commission the rates of a carrier are unjust or unreasonable, then it shall determine and prescribe what will, in its judgment, be a just and reasonable rate. These words evidently mean that Congress intends that the Commission shall exercise its judgment and discretion, and if so, "its acts within the limits of that discretion are not subject to review," quoting Judge Brewer in the case above referred to.

The amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], which provides that the United States circuit courts shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine suits against the Commission, makes only clear and definite what I believe to be in the bill as it passed the House of Representatives. I believe that, Congress having clearly imposed a duty upon the Commission to determine and prescribe what is a just and reasonable rate, the courts will not revise or set aside its decision, except under the conditions that I have heretofore referred to. The purpose of the amendment is to make clear by an affirmative statement what is now in the bill. The courts will now inquire whether the rate is extortionate or confiscatory, but the question whether it is a just and reasonable rate is left for the Commission to determine, and the courts will not modify or revise the discretion of the Commission.

It must not be forgotten that the opponents of this bill have contended that, without a specific amendment showing that Congress intended the courts should have jurisdiction to hear and determine the reasonableness and justness of a rate, they will only determine whether the rate is extortionate or confiscatory. In order to interfere with the determination of the Commission, an amendment must be placed in this bill enlarging the jurisdiction of the courts. This the amendment of the Senator from Iowa does not attempt to do. The opponents of this measure have abandoned their efforts to put into it a court-review amendment that will transfer the whole controversy to the courts. Under this amendment the courts will only consider the two questions specifically designated in my amendment—whether the Commission has exceeded its authority and whether the constitutional rights of anyone have been invaded.

Those who are in favor of this legislation will be successful if the amendment of the Senator from Iowa is adopted, or if the bill is passed without a specific amendment providing for review by the courts.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair informs the Senator from Kansas that his time has expired.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I intend to vote for the Allison amendment, which I believe represents the wishes of the friends of this bill not only in the Senate, but also that it has the concurrence of the President, who has shown himself to be friendly to the bill. In voting for this amendment, however, I shall vote for it upon my own construction of what it means, and not upon the construction that may be given to it by any other Senator. My construction I can place in a very few words. I do not need to go outside of the bill itself to determine what that proper construction shall be. On page 3 of this bill it is provided, in line 14:

> All charges made for any service rendered or to be rendered in the transportation of passengers or property as aforesaid, or in connection therewith, shall be just and reasonable.

Mr. President, that is the standard that is laid down by Congress—the primary power to fix rates to guide the Interstate Commerce Commission. That permission can not go either one side or the other of that standard. They are limited; they are bounded by it.

Now, if we will turn a little further in the bill, we will find that the language is somewhat different on page 10, where the Commission is required to fix the standard, because it says, on line 19, after a hearing the Commission has then the power—> to determine and prescribe what will, in its judgment, be the just and reasonable and fairly remunerative rate or rates, charge or charges, to be thereafter observed, etc.

The only difference between those two propositions is that in this one the words "in its judgment" are inserted. Those words, however, can not control the first proposition, because Congress has no power to confer upon the Interstate Commerce Commission the right to determine, in its own judgment, without Congress fixing the standard what the rate shall be. Otherwise, it would be a clear delegation of legislative power. So we are back to the main proposition that the standard must be whether the rates are just and reasonable.

When we come to the Allison amendment upon the venue, we find this:

> The venue of suits brought in any of the circuit courts of the United States against the Commission to enjoin, set aside, annul, or suspend any order or requirement of the Commission shall be, etc.

And the closing words:

> And jurisdiction to hear and determine such suits is hereby vested in such courts.

Jurisdiction to hear and determine what? We confer upon the Commission the power to fix reasonable rates. What is reviewed, then? The question of whether or not the Commission has in its fixing of rates measured up to the standard that is fixed by Congress is reviewed, and that is the only thing, outside of the questions, which, of course, always may arise, as to whether or not their rates are so low that it would be confiscation of the property and subject to the restriction of the Constitution.

So, Mr. President, if the Commission should fix, under my construction, a rate which, we will say, grants but 1 per cent upon the investment—1 per cent on the net returns—I believe that under this construction the court would say, not whether that would be a destruction of the property but simply whether or not the rate would be just and reasonable. For my part, I believe that it ought to have that power. On the other hand, if it should fix a rate which would be 15 or 20 per cent, then, I believe, the court ought to have the power, upon a suit brought by the shipper himself, to reduce it within this standard. That is the reason I vote for this amendment, because it raises but that one single question of justness and reasonableness; and justness and reasonableness, under my construction, mean just compensation.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President, does the Senator from North Dakota, then, believe that this amendment is broader than the original amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. LONG]?

Mr. McCUMBER. I am inclined to think that, even under the original amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas, the courts could litigate the same thing, because we have fixed the standard, and the Commission is bound to follow that standard. I do not think that any amendment which has been offered changes that standard or the requirement of the Commission to make its rates in harmony with that particular standard.

Mr. President, that is about all that I have to say on the subject. I simply wanted to say to the Senate that I was going to vote for this amendment upon my own construction of what it meant. Though others might consider that it was broader or that it was narrower, I did not intend to bind myself to follow either of those constructions by my vote.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. BACON. I should like to inquire of the Senator whether he considers the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] as one which could by any additional language be made any broader than it is in the matter of review?

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, I think it possibly could be made broader, but if we made it broader to such an extent that the court would be permitted to substitute its own judgment as to what would be a just and reasonable rate for the judgment of the Commission, it would be clearly unconstitutional, because it would be fixing rates by the court, and we could grant no authority to the court to fix rates.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me, he will recall that the amendment proposes to give the right of review, to enjoin, or set aside any order or any requirement. Now, I wish the Senator would accommodate me by suggesting what words can be used which would broaden that scope.

Mr. McCUMBER. There are other requirements than that of fixing rates. We have fixed a standard upon the question of rates——

Mr. BACON. The Senator will pardon me——

Mr. McCUMBER. That is a standard of justness and reasonableness.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me, this amendment does not limit it to an order or a requirement fixing rates, but it is any order or any requirement made by the Commission.

Mr. McCUMBER. I understand.

Mr. BACON. As a matter of curiosity, I should like to know if there is any other word in the English language which can be added to make that any broader than it is.

Mr. McCUMBER. We are speaking now of the reasonableness of rates and the construction that is to be given to this section as to whether or not it increases or enlarges the power of the courts, so that they can determine anything further than the question of the reasonableness and justness of rates. In reference to hundreds of other orders, no such question would necessarily arise. There might be an order requiring them to place in a spur; there might be an order requiring them to do many other things where the question of the justness or the reasonableness of it is not the standard; and where that is not the standard, as in the case of rates, then, of course, the decision, in my opinion, of the Commission would be conclusive unless it went so far as to be contrary to the constitutional provision.

Mr. BACON. I am speaking not of the construction the Senator from North Dakota has put upon the words, but I have asked him as a scholar to give me a single word out of the entire dictionary, which he can add to the words "any order or requirement," which will broaden the scope of these words—"any order or requirement of the Commission" is the language of the amendment. Now, out of the entire lexicon, will the Senator give me a word which will broaden the scope covered by those words?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not think we can broaden the scope as to what may be considered. The court may consider any of those orders.

Mr. BACON. I am speaking about the language of the amendment, and I ask, can the Senator suggest any words, or any single word, in the English language, that would broaden the scope covered by the words "any order or requirement of the Commission?"

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not know that I entirely comprehend what the Senator is aiming at. He can probably make himself clear by an illustration, and then I will answer.

Mr. BACON. The proposed amendment gives to the courts the jurisdiction to enjoin or set aside any order or requirement made by the Commission. Now, I want to know if, in the opinion of the Senator, there is any word in the English language which can broaden the scope of the jurisdiction which those words would give to the courts if the amendment is adopted? I am not talking about the construction of the Senator, but I am talking about the words.

Mr. McCUMBER. Undoubtedly a set of words could be used, but I do not say that any one single word could broaden the jurisdiction.

Mr. BACON. Any one will do.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have tried to make plain to the Senator my contention that in the rehearing upon any other orders, except the orders to determine the reasonableness of a rate, there must be some interference with the constitutional protection of property rights; and, if there is none, then, under this amendment, I do not for a moment concede that the courts could interfere with it.

Mr. BACON. I will ask the Senator another question, then, with his permission, of course.

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. Does the Senator think that the scope of the jurisdiction which is conferred by this proposed amendment can, by any other words, be made any other than those words make it?

Mr. McCUMBER. I have stated that I thought it could. I have answered the Senator several times.

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator will suggest another.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am not taking the time now to reformulate this section for the benefit of the Senator so that it may be made to express more. I conceive that it can be made to express more than it expresses now, but I insist that, in so far as the reasonableness of rates is concerned, if it is made broader than it is now it may be subject to the constitutional inhibition.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. FULTON. I should like to suggest, Mr. President, that if these words were inserted, "and in the exercise of such jurisdiction the court is authorized to review the discretion exercised by the Commission," it would open up an immensely wider field. Whether or not the courts would exercise the jurisdiction, certainly that language would be broader.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, there can be no question about that. The court can review the discretion of the Commission only to the extent of ascertaining whether or not in the exercise of that discretion it has measured up to the standard that is prescribed by the bill itself.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Dakota allow me to ask him a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from North Dakota has expired.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am obliged to yield.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] has shown plainly that what is designed by this amendment is to carry all of the transactions of the Interstate Commerce Commission and their judgment and discretion in all the details of this bill to the Supreme Court, utterly ignoring that the only ground on which the review by the Supreme Court has been predicated by it is the violation of the Constitution in the fifth amendment, where the Constitution applies solely to the States in the fourteenth amendment. In fact, Mr. President, the Supreme Court has said time and again and over and over that it is no part of its function either to prescribe what is a reasonable rate—which it will never do—or to review a rate on the ground that it was unreasonable, even though, with the same testimony before them, they were to think that another rate would be more reasonable than the one fixed.

In the remarks which I had the honor to make, and which I do not intend to repeat, I went over this ground with some fullness and was forced to take that ground by a careful perusal of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. Mr. Justice Harlan said in one of those cases to which prominence has been justly given in this debate:

> But it should also be remembered that the judiciary ought not to interfere with the collection of rates established under legislative sanction unless they are so plainly and palpably unreasonable as to make their enforcement equivalent to the taking of property for public use without such compensation as under all the circumstances is just to both the owner and the public—that is, judicial interference should never occur unless the case presents clearly and beyond all doubt such a flagrant attack upon the rights of property under the guise of regulations as to compel the court to say that the rates prescribed will necessarily have the effect to deny just compensation for private property taken for the public use.

This was said in the San Diego Land Company case (174 U. S.), and the cases which Justice Harlan cites, which might be read to the same effect, are the Chicago and Grand Trunk Railway Company v. Wellman (143 U. S., pp. 339–344), Reagan v. Farmers' Loan and Trust Company (154 U. S., pp. 362–399), Smyth v. Ames (167 U. S.), and Henderson Bridge Company v. Henderson City (173 U. S.). A half dozen other cases might also be cited.

Mr. President, there is no tenet of our Federal law so clearly defined or more frequently maintained and illustrated by the decisions of the United States Supreme Court than that for which the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] contends. The defense by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] completely shows that the interpretation of it by the Senator from Maryland is correct and that it is attempted here to carry up to the higher tribunals and to the Supreme Court of the United States those elements of this law which it has shown time and again, and luminously shown, belong to the administrative department of the Government and should be left to its administrative officers, just as it is left to the Secretary of State and to every other Cabinet minister, and sometimes to subordinate officers of less dignity and less weight of character, in such concerns.

To my mind the Senate would make a great mistake if it were to form a plan, under the guise of protection of property, which has no more relation to the protection of property than all the administrative acts of the United States which compass civil liberty, titles to land, pensions, and property rights in all their infinite varieties.

I shall, therefore, vote—and feel that I ought to vote under the repudiation of the courts of such ideas as have now been interpolated in this bill—for the amendment of the Senator from Maryland.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I shall only detain the Senate for a few moments. Some time in March I offered a proposed amendment to this bill, which embodied several distinct propositions. One of those propositions provided for what we have termed here a "narrow" or a "limited" court review. I shall not offer that part of my amendment, because the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER], upon which we voted yesterday, embraced substantially the same proposition; but, Mr. President, in view of the fact, as stated by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. FULTON], that there is a misunderstanding in the country as to the exact line of cleavage here in the Senate upon this question of court review and in view of the fact that Senators on the other side of the Chamber who have been supposed to be in favor of a limited court review have suddenly changed their position upon that question and have advanced here in justification of their present position a legal proposition which has not been discussed up to this time, I think the time which the Senate has given to-day to the discussion of this question has been time well spent.

Most of the discussion upon this measure up to the present time has been upon the proposition of the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] with reference to the suspension by the courts of the rate fixed by the Commission. There has been but little discussion of the question of court review.

Mr. President, I want to state my position with reference to this question of court review, because I have found what the Senator from Oregon has just said with reference to a misunderstanding on the part of the people as to the line of cleavage between Senators on this question is true from personal contact with people in my own State on the occasion of a recent visit to that State. No Senator on this side of the Chamber has at any time insisted that the courts should not have the right under any circumstances to review an order of the Commission. Some have insisted that the courts had the right of review in certain cases, whether there was any express provision in the act conferring that power or not; but every Senator on this side of the Chamber who has expressed himself upon this subject has taken the position that if the courts did not have inherently and without express provision in the bill power to review questions which involved the constitutional rights of the carrier or the shipper that power ought to be conferred upon them by an express declaration. Mr. President, while common carriers are charged with a public duty, and therefore are subject to governmental supervision, the ownership of railroads is private property, and is just as much entitled to the protection guaranteed by the fifth amendment to the Constitution as any other private property, and I would not myself consciously cast a vote that would in any way impair that right. This, I think, is the position taken by every Senator on this side who has addressed himself to this phase of the subject.

The Supreme Court has decided—and that decision meets the approval of my judgment—that if Government, whether national or State, shall fix a rate which is so low as to deprive the carrier of its property without just compensation, that would be an unlawful rate; that such a rate would violate the fifth amendment to the Constitution, and that the courts would not only restrain such rate, but set it aside as null and void. It is also true that if the Commission, acting for Congress—and the Commission is nothing more than the agent of Congress in the matter of fixing rates—shall fix a rate which is so low as to deprive the carrier of his property without just compensation the courts would restrain such rate and set it aside.

Not only that, Mr. President, but if the Congress or the Commission, performing the functions of Congress and acting as its agent, shall fix a rate so unreasonably high as to be extortionate, it is probable that the shipper would have a right to complain, and that the courts would declare such a rate unconstitutional, because it would to a certain extent take the property of the shipper without just compensation. In both of these cases the rate, whether fixed by Congress directly or by the Commission acting as its agent, would violate the constitutional guaranty of the fifth amendment, and no action of Congress could deprive the courts of the power to review such a rate.

Again, if the Commission should exceed the jurisdiction conferred upon it by the interstate-commerce act and by this act, if it should make an order which it is not authorized to make under the laws of its creation, if it should attempt to exercise a power not conferred upon it by Congress, such act or order would be ultra vires and unlawful, and the courts would have the power to review and set it aside, despite the action of even prohibition of Congress. But, Mr. President, there is a broad gulf, so to speak, between a rate that is confiscatorily low, and therefore unconstitutional, and a rate which is extortionately high, and therefore unconstitutional. And every rate prescribed by the Commission within these limits, between these two boundary lines, is a lawful and a constitutional rate. That rate ought to stand, and no court ought to have power or jurisdiction to review, modify, set it aside, or suspend its operation for a single day, hour, or minute.

Why? Because fixing a rate is a legislative function. If it be fixed by Congress, it is a purely legislative function; if by the Commission, acting under a standard and rule prescribed by Congress, it is a quasi legislative function.

The courts have no power, and none should be given them, to review an act of Congress or of the Commission acting for it under a standard prescribed by it which does not violate the Constitution and is not ultra vires. The courts have no more power to review a rate so fixed than they have to review a law passed by Congress in the lawful exercise of its lawful powers. If the Congress shall pass an act which is unconstitutional, the courts have a right to set it aside, but if the act be constitutional, the court has no power to inquire whether that act proceeded upon lines of wise public policy. It has no power to inquire and determine whether that act is sound in policy or in principle. So when the Commission fixes a lawful rate as distinguished from an unconstitutional rate, the courts have no right to review that rate. They have no right to inquire into and settle the question of whether such rate is fixed in accordance with wise policy or sound principle.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like very much to yield, but I have much I wish to say, and under the fifteen-minute rule I will not have time to say it if I yield. The Senator can have the floor when my time expires.

Mr. President, after we have discussed here for three months the question of limited and of broad court review, suddenly the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber, who have agreed with us in our position upon that proposition, have changed front and given their sanction to an amendment which I think, and which every lawyer is bound to think, is as broad a court review as human language can express. When charged with inconsistency and surrender they attempt to justify their present position by a contention as to the statutory powers of the courts which has not been asserted or declared during the course of this debate by a single one of them until yesterday, and which is utterly inconsistent with their former position and contentions.

The amendment introduced by the Senator from Iowa changes materially the provisions in the bill as it came from the House. The bill as it came from the House provided for the venue of suits to set aside, annul or enjoin the orders and requirements of the Commission. It went no further than to say that any action which the court might entertain, under the general law as it now exists, should be brought within a certain district. It fixed the venue of such suits and stopped there. That is as far as the original bill went.

The VICE-PRESIDENT rapped with his gavel.

Mr. SIMMONS. Has my time expired?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. SIMMONS. I shall pursue the course of my distinguished colleague from Maryland, and shall try to finish this speech upon some other amendment.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I would not attempt to make a contribution to this debate at this late hour were it not for the manner in which the discussion on this particular amendment was initiated or brought into the Chamber. I feel that the time for action has arrived, and that the period for discussion has substantially closed. But the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] and likewise the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER], precipitating a discussion on this amendment or one similar, thought proper to reflect upon the attitude of the President of the United States, whose relation to this legislation is only of the character contemplated by the Constitution. The President might, in the strict discharge of his duty, decline to exchange views with any member of the Senate calling at the Executive offices for the purpose of suggesting or considering any part or portion of this or any other pending legislation. It so happens, however, that the President is deeply interested in the success of this legislation. Before his nomination, while a candidate for the Presidency, I think the present Chief Executive gave the most heroic and courageous exhibition on a public question, in dealing with this subject, to be found in our political annals within the last forty years of our political life. The statesmen of the country have been somewhat timid in assailing the majestic and supposedly invincible railroad power. A few men in this Chamber have from time to time uttered sentiments contrary to the generally accepted theory upon which the laws were being administered. They had found from time to time political graves, and they at least believed in many instances that their political extinction was due to no considerable extent to the temerity they displayed in suggesting that reasonable regulation of railroad rates should be provided by Congress.

The Senator from Texas and the Senator from Maryland vouchsafed to us the opinions entertained by them, respectively, that the President had finally abandoned the bill for which he stood so firmly in the beginning, and this charge is hypothecated upon the proposed amendment to section 5 of the bill, or section 16 of the interstate-commerce act, as proposed to be amended by this bill.

Permit me, for the purpose of making the RECORD explicit, to read the text of the bill to which the amendment is directed as it was passed by the House of Representatives and transmitted to this body:

> The venue of suits brought in any of the circuit courts of the United States to enjoin, set aside, annul, or suspend any order or requirement of the Commission shall be in the district where the carrier against whom such order or requirement may have been made has its principal operating office.

Now I will ask the Senators if it is true that anyone supporting that proposition had a mental reservation to the effect that the courts would have no jurisdiction to try or determine the subjects-matter referred to in the section? If that mental reservation existed in the light of the language quoted, then I submit that it was a dishonest reservation; that anyone willing to deal fairly and squarely and honestly and above board would only construe that part of the section as conferring jurisdiction on the courts, and only those, if any there be, willing to cheat through language of indirection could possibly otherwise construe it. It was insisted, however, that there was an ambiguity as to the jurisdiction. In every public utterance throughout this country and in messages to Congress the President had made it clearly manifest that he believed in the jurisdiction of the courts extending over the acts of the Commission; and to him it was obvious that if this bill did not provide for court jurisdiction in the language I have read, it should be made to so provide. And therefore the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa is but intended to clear up an ambiguity in the bill as it came from the House.

No one familiar with the President's record upon this railroad rate legislation, or upon any other public question, I assume, can justly charge him with either cowardice or shiftiness. There are some who charge that he is too bold and fearless and outspoken, but for the first time is it intimated by the Senators from Texas and Maryland that he is prepared to, or did make, an abject surrender. In consenting to this amendment, and I believe it has his full approval, the President merely made the bill honest and square, made it to clearly express what I believe all Senators understood it to contain, with the exception of those few who, in a hypercritical mood, questioned the sufficiency of the language to clearly convey court jurisdiction.

Now, Mr. President, as to the critics. I say the President's record upon this and every other public question he has touched is a record of courage unmatched, certainly unexcelled. The Senator from Maryland, who thought proper to assail the President as having abjectly surrendered, was an honored member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in the House of Representatives when Theodore Roosevelt was a young ranchman riding the range with the cowboys in North Dakota. For six years he was a member of the House of Representatives. He has been a respected member of this body for quite a period of time, and his enthusiasm upon this question led me to ask what he had offered in the way of contribution to check the mighty power of the railways of this country in all these years. I find upon inquiry at the document room that this is the sum total of the legislation offered by the Senator from Maryland to curb the railroad power up to the opening of the present Congress. It will be found that in the bill H. R. 3291, Fifty-third Congress, second session, the Senator from Maryland presented this proviso as an amendment of the interstate-commerce act:

> Provided further, That nothing in this act shall prevent the issuance of joint interchangeable 5,000-mile tickets, with special privileges as to the amount of free baggage that may be carried under mileage tickets of 1,000 or more miles.

That is the record of the critic from Maryland.

Mr. RAYNER. Do you mean I offered that in the Senate?

Mr. CARTER. No; it was offered in the Fifty-third Congress, in the House of Representatives.

Mr. RAYNER. How far back are you going now?

Mr. CARTER. Over the whole record.

Mr. RAYNER. You are going back to what I did fifteen years ago?

Mr. CARTER. The Senator from Texas, in all candor, stands in no better position to criticise the President. He was a leader of his party, and a superb leader he made. He is a gifted man, with mighty resources. He was for ten years a member of the House of Representatives before Theodore Roosevelt reached a place where he could exercise any influence on national legislation. And yet the Senator from Texas, in all the ten years of his superb devotion to the people on the railroad question, only introduced, by request, on the 28th day of February, 1894, a bill providing that scalpers' tickets should not be sold throughout the country, and providing a fine of $5,000 to be applied to any man who sold a ticket he had purchased, unless he had first offered it back to the railroad company.

I do submit in all candor that the Senators should have desisted from any very drastic criticism of the President of the United States on railroad rate records. I do not, however, blame the Senators for this paucity of production. They belong to a party of negation. The Senators are not expected, from that standpoint, to engage in constructive legislation, and I am not surprised that at this stage of the proceedings, when the Senators perceive that we are about to crystallize something into law, they are suddenly seized with a chill. The talking is about to be concluded and action is about to begin.

The Senator vouchsafed us some information concerning the component parts of our party organization, and referred to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] as having come into camp or the camp having gone to the Senator—I do not know in what particular form. The fact that we get together is due to a certain clearly defined basic principle. The people who believe in doing things, who believe in reconciling differences, who believe in results, are on this side of the Chamber. The people who enjoy bickerings and continuous strife and ceaseless controversy naturally belong to the other side, and some of them enjoy the speeches made by both the Senator from Maryland and the Senator from Texas. We do not pretend to have such orators upon this side. So in our humble way we proceed to achieve things, and we stand responsible for results when results are attained.

Mr. President, I say this in a kindly spirit, because no one respects the eminent Senator from Texas more than I do. No one has higher regard for the superb abilities of the Senator from Maryland than I have. But I do think that when they establish themselves as critics of the Republican party, and particularly of the President of the United States, they should be backed by better records than either has presented upon this question.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the ebullition which the Senate has just witnessed is due entirely to the fact that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] forgot to mention the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] yesterday as among the President's special ambassadors to the Senate. And the Senator from Montana was afraid that this debate would close without the attention of the country being called to the fact that he had borne some, though an inconspicuous part, in the reconciliation which has been brought about among Republican Senators.

When the Senator talks about my record he ought to know—of course he does not know many things, but he has searched the RECORD enough to have learned—that during the ten years I served in the House of Representatives my party was in a majority only the first four years of my service there. In the Congress to which he alludes as having passed under my leadership he must know that the Democrats were in the minority, and from that time to this I have had the misfortune—but the country has suffered the greater misfortune—of having a Republican majority, first in the House and then in the Senate. And so, if I had introduced a bill to regulate the railroads, I would have been performing an act of mere buncombe, such as that performed by the Senator from Montana this morning.

The Senator from Montana says that I assailed the President because he had changed his position on the character of a court review. I said nothing about the President's position on that question. In the short speech which I made in the beginning of the session yesterday I did say that the President had changed his position with reference to a suspension of rates pending a reversal by the court, and I did call attention to the fact that the President had abandoned his first demand for an absolute rate and had accepted the compromise of a maximum rate. But I said nothing about a change in his attitude toward the court review; and in a subsequent speech which I made in reply to the honorable Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] I did not refer to the President's position in that respect. Therefore, when the Senator from Montana is lecturing other people about misrepresenting the President he ought to be careful not to fall within his own condemnation.

The Senator from Montana in his enthusiasm to be recognized as a friend, a defender, an ambassador, as it were, of the President, declares that in the face of the last Presidential election the President gave the country an exhibition of matchless courage in defying the tremendous power of the railroads. Has the Senator from Montana examined the record on that question, as he did the record of the Senator from Maryland and myself? What will the Senate say when I tell the Senator from Montana that in his messages of 1902 and 1903 the President was as silent as the grave upon the question of regulating the railroads; that standing in the presence of the American people, pending the great contest of 1904, he spoke never a word in its favor, either in his letter of acceptance or in his speech of acceptance.

Let me put it in the RECORD. In the President's message of 1901 he said:

The act should be amended.

The interstate-commerce act.

The railway is a public servant. Its rates should be just to and open to all shippers alike.

In his message of 1902 he said nothing at all. In his message of 1903 he was still silent upon the subject, and only after his election in 1904 did he challenge the railroad power to mortal combat. Did the Senator from Montana know that when he declared that the President had exhibited a marvelous courage in defying the powerful influence of the railroads prior to his election?

Mr. CARTER. Will the Senator from Texas yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. CARTER. Does not the Senator from Texas know that in a public address, delivered in the city of Minneapolis, before his nomination, to which the Senator refers, the President of the United States had, in clear, distinct, and unequivocal terms, announced his position upon the subject, and likewise upon necessary antitrust prosecutions and legislation?

Mr. BAILEY. I am free to say that I did not know the President had discussed the railroad question in his speech at Minneapolis. I have examined his public messages to Congress; I have examined his speech of acceptance; I have examined his letter of acceptance, and I have found no word in them. I will tell the Senator from Montana more. But first let me say, Mr. President, that this turn in the debate is not of my choosing. I have studiously refrained from speaking any bitter word against the President during this prolonged struggle. I have felt that all the friends of efficient legislation on this subject ought to spare each other from attack and bitter speech, and I have borne patiently some things of which I had a right to complain rather than create divisions and dissensions among the friends of this bill.

Let me tell the Senator from Montana, further, that in the summer of 1904, before the President had spoken his speech or written his letter of acceptance, his secretary, in reply to a letter addressed to President Roosevelt by the publication known as "Freight," said to the editor of that paper that the President in his letter or speech of acceptance would speak out on the railroad question, and speak in a manner entirely satisfactory to that editor. And yet, sir, the Senator will search in vain both the letter of acceptance and the speech of acceptance for a word to redeem the promise of the President's secretary.

I do not say the President put it in his message and then when his astute political advisers told him that the railroads would not contribute to his campaign that he cut it out. I will not say that, although there are many men uncharitable enough to say it. I only put before the Senate and the country the fact that his secretary said the President would speak on it and that he did not speak on it. Perhaps those insurance companies which were contributing the trust funds of widows and orphans to secure his election owned so many of these railroad bonds that they deterred, not the President, but the President's advisers, from proclaiming his hostility against the railroads immediately preceding the election.

Mr. President, I love a brave man; I love a fighter; and the President of the United States is both—on occasions; but he can yield with as much alacrity as any man who ever went to battle, civic or political. That he fights furiously at first I grant you, but he seems to have no endurance in these political contests. Only a short time ago he was going to revise the tariff, but his friends called him off. When that great voice was filling the nation with a demand for tariff revision, suddenly it sank into the gentleness and sweetness of a whisper. Next he was going to have the railroads regulated, and it was announced that Congress would be convened in extraordinary session to deal with it; but the great leaders assembled with the President, prayed with him a little while, and no call was issued for an extraordinary session of Congress. He waited until the regular session, and five months of that has elapsed and still no legislation.

If the President were the heroic figure which the Senator from Montana would have us believe him, you know what he would have done. He would have summoned these Republican leaders of the House and the Senate to a conference, and he would have said to them: "Gentlemen, I am not talking to you now as President of the United States; I am talking to you as Theodore Roosevelt, a Republican, and I am talking to you as Republicans. I want to tell you that I happen to know that unless you pass a good bill the President of the United States intends to veto it." They would then have passed a bill fulfilling in some degree the reasonable expectations of our people. If Congress had failed to do that, and he had vetoed the bill they passed and then convened them in extraordinary session to pass a good one, he would have written his name with the names of Jefferson and Jackson and Lincoln among his illustrious predecessors. But he did not deal with the situation in that firm way, and let us have no more talk in the Senate and in the country about this iron man. He is clay, and very common clay.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from Texas permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BAILEY. I will.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator think that the bill which passed the House of Representatives and received the unanimous vote of the Republicans in that body is an effective piece of legislation?

Mr. BAILEY. I do not, and I will go further and say it is not as good as that same bill will be when it passes this body. But both of them together are not as good as they ought to be.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM]. [Putting the question.] The ayes have it.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I addressed myself to you before you announced the vote, and I notified the Chair last night that there was a verbal change in the amendment I wished to make.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair did not understand the Senator from South Carolina to rise to this question. The amendment is open.

Mr. TILLMAN. I suggest that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois, originated by the Senator from Iowa, be changed so as to insert at the beginning in regard to the suits against carriers these words in lieu of the words that are now in the amendment:

In case such order or requirement affects two or more carriers the suit may be brought by them jointly in the district wherein the principal operating office of either is situated.

It prevents two suits where there is a joint rate between two roads by having one against both in the district where the principal operating office of either is situated. It does not alter in any sense the meaning or purport of the amendment; it simplifies the procedure; and I hope the Senator from Iowa will accept it.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the Senator will indicate what it proposes and how it will read.

Mr. TILLMAN. "In case such order or requirement"——

Mr. CULLOM. Where is it to come in?

Mr. TILLMAN. In place of the language in the amendment now pending relating to this very same subject.

Mr. CULLOM. Where? Locate it so that we can turn to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from South Carolina kindly state the page and line?

Mr. TILLMAN. I have it somewhere here, if I can find it.

Mr. ALLISON. Page 17, line 14, after the word "office."

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes; page 17, line 14, after the word "office."

The Allison amendment proposes the following:

And if the order or requirement has been made against two or more carriers then in the district where any one of said carriers has its principal operating office, etc.

The language I wish to substitute is:

In case such order or requirement affects two or more carriers the suit may be brought by them jointly in the district where the principal operating office of either is situated.

If there are joint rates between two roads——

Mr. ALLISON. I must confess I do not see the difference in phraseology in the Senator's amendment and the amendment pending:

And if the order or requirement has been made against two or more carriers then in the district where any one of said carriers has its principal operating office.

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes; but you do not include the joint rate, and it requires a suit in each district where the two carriers are located, whereas the language I suggest is:

In case such order or requirement affects two or more carriers the suit may be brought by them jointly in the place wherein the principal operating office of either is situated.

In other words, you have one suit against two carriers, and you have that suit against each in the district where the principal operating office of either is situated. That is the purpose I have in view.

Mr. CULLOM. Those words are proposed to be inserted after the word "office," in the provision as it was introduced by myself for the Senator from Iowa. Is that what the Senator is trying to do?

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes; I am trying to substitute a provision by which instead of having two suits, one against one carrier in one district and another against another carrier in another district, there may be a joint suit against both in the districts wherein the principal operating office of either is situated. It is not very material. I am not insisting on it at all.

Mr. ALLISON. I think under the language as it stands that could be done.

Mr. TILLMAN. Very well; if the Senator from Iowa does not accept it, it is all right to me.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. BAILEY. I understood the amendment had been agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It has not been agreed to. It is still open to amendment.

Mr. BAILEY. I am not able quite to see the form in which it is presented. I wish to inquire if the entire amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] in behalf of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] is now before the Senate?

Mr. CULLOM. Only the one amendment we have been discussing lately.

Mr. BAILEY. And only those words in italics are now before the Senate?

Mr. CULLOM. So I understand.

Mr. BAILEY. I wanted to move to strike out the venue there, which is laid in the district where the carrier has its principal operating office, and substitute "the district from which the complaint comes or in which it originates," but if the entire proposition is not now before the Senate then that is improper.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair did not understand the suggestion of the Senator from Texas. The entire amendment of the Senator from Iowa is now pending.

Mr. BAILEY. Then I will ask the Chair the distinct question, Are lines from line 1 to the word "office, in line 6, on page 9, of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois in behalf of the Senator from Iowa now before the Senate?

Mr. CULLOM. That amendment was adopted yesterday.

Mr. BAILEY. Not the whole amendment.

Mr. CULLOM. The amendment introduced consisted of several amendments, and the first amendments which were reached in the order of sections were disposed of up to and including the amendment on page 17 of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair does not have the text before him, but will have the Secretary again state the pending amendment, and then the Senator from Texas can determine whether his amendment will be in order at this time.

The SECRETARY. On page 17 of the printed bill, line 14, after the word "office," the last word in the line, strike out the period and insert a comma and insert the words:

And if the order or requirement has been made against two or more carriers——

Mr. BAILEY. That is far enough, Mr. President, to advise me that the part I want to amend is not the pending question.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment. I have before me the printed amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CULLOM. Has the amendment of the Senator from Iowa been acted upon?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Not yet.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. Is there any amendment now pending to the amendment of the amendment of the Senator from Iowa?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. No; that has been withdrawn; but the Senator from Georgia is proposing an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BACON. On page 317 of the compilation, line 12, where the amendment is found, I move to insert after the word "and" in the twelfth line these words:

Concerning orders and requirements not involving the exercise of discretion by the Commission.

So that it will read:

And concerning orders and requirements not involving the exercise of discretion by the Commission, and jurisdiction to hear and determine such suits is hereby vested in such courts.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. NELSON. I make the point of order that that is not an amendment to the pending amendment, but to a different paragraph of the bill.

Mr. BACON. I was unfortunate in expressing myself surely, because it is directly an insertion of words in the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa, and it can not be anything else than an amendment to the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the proposed amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BACON. I will hand it to the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. In the proposed amendment of the Senator from Illinois, line 8 of the printed amendment, printed separately, after the word "any" and before the word "jurisdiction," insert the following:

Concerning orders and requirements not involving the exercise of discretion by the Commission.

So that, if amended, the amendment will read:

Then the venue shall be in the district where said carrier has its principal office, and concerning orders and requirements not involving the exercise of discretion by the Commission jurisdiction to hear and determine such suits is hereby vested in such courts.

Mr. BACON. Now, Mr. President, just a word. The discussion which we have had as to the meaning of the amendment has elicited from Senators repeatedly the expression of the opinion that the amendment means exactly what these words specify it shall mean. When the attention of Senators is called to the fact that the words found in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa are of so broad a scope that no word can be found in the English language which can broaden that scope, Senators rejoin that the courts will construe it to mean what these words sought to be interpolated will express.

If the Senators are candid in that statement—if they mean what they say, if they are in earnest when they contend that this amendment will not give to the courts the right to review the act of the Commission in any particular in the making of rates or in any other order or requirement where such order or requirement is in the exercise of discretion—then, of course, they will vote for this amendment to the amendment.

Mr. President, I can see no reason why Senators would vote against this amendment, except that they do not agree with what has been said by Senators in that regard. The Senator from Iowa himself on yesterday said that if a question was brought before the court which involved an order or a requirement by the Commission in the exercise of its discretion, the court would undoubtedly refuse to review such act in making such order or requirement.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. FULTON. I ask the Senator if the amendment he has offered would not prohibit the court from inquiring into orders made by the Commission in order to ascertain whether or not the constitutional rights of a party had been invaded?

Mr. BACON. That is the first suggestion out of the many we have had in this debate that the question of constitutional right can possibly be raised, either directly or indirectly, in the exercise of any discretion.

Mr. FULTON. Very well; this is the point: The court has to inquire into the order made by the Commission. The Commission is supposed to make all orders in the exercise of its discretion, but it may abuse that discretion to the extent that it violates constitutional right. Now, the amendment offered by the Senator would prohibit the court from making inquiry in order to ascertain whether or not a constitutional right had been invaded.

Mr. BACON. By no means, Mr. President. If this section read simply that jurisdiction is given to the courts to hear, the contention of the Senator, while still not, I think, well founded, might be plausible; but it says "hear and determine;" in other words, to determine that it is wrong, to reverse it, to annul it; but if this amendment is adopted, while the court, of course, will inquire as to anything that is brought before it when it comes to determine upon it, if it finds it to be a matter of discretion, it will say "this is without our jurisdiction; we have no jurisdiction to determine that which rests within the discretion of the Commission."

Mr. FULTON. But they hear and determine that the discretion had not been abused; that the constitutional rights had not been invaded.

Mr. BACON. No; it would be outside their jurisdiction altogether.

Mr. President, this will test the sincerity of Senators. If they believe that it is the scope of the amendment to exclude from the jurisdiction of the courts the right to hear and determine questions which involve simply the exercise of discretion on the part of the Commission, they will of course vote for this amendment.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BACON. With pleasure.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator think that the fixing of rates involves in no degree discretion?

Mr. BACON. The question as to whether or not it is just and reasonable has been determined by the courts repeatedly, as the Senator knows better than I do, because he is more familiar with this subject than I am, to be strictly a judicial question. So the question of the Senator can not have pertinency in this connection.

Mr. SPOONER. But the language of the bill is—I think it is dangerous language myself—that the Commission shall fix what in their judgment will be a reasonable rate.

Mr. BACON. I think that is dangerous language, and I would rather have it out.

Mr. SPOONER. Is the Senator absolutely certain that the language he employs in his amendment would not, if given any effect whatever, defeat the judicial-review provision?

Mr. BACON. I think it certainly would not. But, Mr. President, here is the plain issue. Here is an amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa which is absolutely without limitation, which is as broad as human language can make it, giving to the court the right to review every order or requirement made by the Commission; and when Senators are challenged by the fact that they have made such a review the reply is that it will not embrace a review of matters involving the exercise of discretion. I have simply put in words the language already uttered by Senators and ask that it may be incorporated in the bill, so that if what they say is correct it may not depend simply upon their understanding, but may be specified in the language of the act. That is the plain issue, Mr. President, and all the talking from now until the adjournment of this Congress could not make that which lies upon the surface any plainer than it is.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], would, in my opinion, render this bill unconstitutional. It provides that only orders and requirements not involving the exercise of discretion by the Commission can be investigated in the courts. By section 4 of this bill authority is given the Commission to prescribe and determine a rate which, in its judgment, is just and reasonable. In doing that the Commission must of necessity exercise its discretion, and if it exercises its discretion then under this amendment the order could not be reviewed by the court. The effect of the amendment would be to prohibit a review by the courts of practically all of the orders of the Commission——

Mr. BACON. If the Senator from Kansas will pardon me, I desire to say that I think the effect of this amendment will be practically to make the bill what it would have been if the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas had been adhered to by him and persisted in by him and had been adopted. But as he has abandoned it I am trying to bring it back to the same position that he so continually represented himself as being in favor of here for several weeks.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. LONG. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. I only wanted to ask the Senator what I did not understand by his statement, that the Commission must of necessity in making a rate exercise its discretion. Have we not created a standard by which the Commission is to be governed in the making of rates?

Mr. LONG. We have provided a standard, but the duty is imposed upon the Commission to exercise its judgment in determining and prescribing a rate according to that standard.

Mr. FORAKER. The point is one about which I think the Senator will not disagree with me. I only want to bring it out and put it in the RECORD that the standard which we have created, or will have created when this bill has become a law, namely, that rates shall be just and reasonable, is a standard that can not be conformed to except by the exercise of discretion and judgment on the part of the Commission. It would follow, of course, that the judgment of one Commission might differ from the judgment of another Commission or the judgment of one man might differ from the judgment of another man.

Mr. LONG. But the discretion exercised by the Commission would not be interfered with or revised by the court unless there was an abuse of the discretion, or unless the rate was fixed so low that it did not give a fair return to the carrier on the property employed in the service.

The Senator from Georgia says it is his intention to bring this question back to where it would be under my amendment. As I have already stated to the Senate, the action of the courts under my amendment or under the amendment of the Senator from Iowa would be exactly the same. They would take cognizance of judicial questions; they could not be prevented from considering such questions, but questions of policy or wisdom would not be considered by the courts under either of these amendments.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. LONG. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will put the case directly to the Senator. Suppose the Commission finds that a net revenue of 3 per cent would be sufficient, and fix the rate accordingly, does the Senator then contend that the court could not hold that that 3 per cent was not a just and reasonable rate and did not measure up to the standard fixed for the Commission?

Mr. LONG. As a question of compensation?

Mr. McCUMBER. Would not the court have a right to set it aside upon that ground alone?

Mr. LONG. The question as to whether or not a given rate afforded just compensation would be a judicial question that the courts would determine for themselves, without regard to the determination of the Commission.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then the judgment of the court may set aside the discretion of the Commission if, in the judgment of the court, the discretion of the Commission does not measure up to the standard fixed by Congress?

Mr. LONG. To the standard fixed by the Constitution—of just compensation. The objection which I have to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia is that it attempts to prohibit the review of practically all of the orders made by the Commission. If an order is made in which it exercises discretion, under the amendment of the Senator from Georgia the courts would be prohibited from reviewing such an order; and that would clearly fall within the decision of the Supreme Court in the Minnesota Milk case (134 U. S., 459), in which the statute was declared unconstitutional because it was construed to prevent a review by the courts.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. LONG. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I have stated that I have endeavored in this amendment to restore the status which was at least possible when the Senator presented his amendment. The Senator has not yet offered his amendment, nor has he withdrawn it. If some of us will offer it for him, will the Senator vote for it?

Mr. LONG. I discussed that question yesterday with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER]. No one has yet presented my amendment. I will meet that question when it arises.

Mr. BACON. I will accommodate the Senator. I will present the amendment.

Mr. LONG. A short time ago, while interrupting the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] wanted to know what language could be used that would broaden the review amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON]. In my remarks yesterday I referred to language that would broaden that amendment. I wish to call the attention of the Senator again to words that would make a broad review of that amendment. I suggest these words:

> And jurisdiction to hear and determine in such suits whether the rate fixed by the Commission is in fact just and reasonable is hereby vested in such court.

With the permission of the Senate, I desire to print in connection with my remarks made this morning extracts from my speech on this question made on April 3, 1906; also extracts from the document which was prepared by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], showing the court reviews in the different States, to which I referred yesterday. I also desire to print extracts from the decisions of the Supreme Court in support of the propositions I made this morning. I will not read these documents and decisions now, but, with the permission of the Senate, will insert them in my remarks of this morning.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the permission is granted.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

Mr. BACON. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SPOONER (when his name was called). As I have several times heretofore announced, I have a general pair with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK], who is absent. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]; which leaves me at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. WARREN] is absent, having been called out of the city on important business. He desired me to also announce the fact that he is paired with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY].

Mr. MONEY. I am paired with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], who has gone home on important business. If he were present, I should vote "yea" on this amendment to the amendment. I make this as an announcement sufficient for succeeding votes.

Mr. LATIMER (after having voted in the affirmative). I had forgotten that I had a pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. PLATT], and I therefore withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 22, nays 46, as follows:

YEAS—22.

Bacon	Daniel	McCreary	Rayner
Berry	Dubois	McLaurin	Simmons
Blackburn	Foster	Martin	Stone
Clarke, Ark.	Frazier	Morgan	Taliaferro
Clay	Gearin	Newlands
Culberson	La Follette	Overman

NAYS—46.

Aldrich	Clapp	Gamble	Nixon

Burton	Gorman	Money	Tillman
Carmack	Heyburn	Patterson	Warren
Clark, Mont.	Knox	Penrose
Crane	Latimer	Pettus
Depew	McEnery	Platt

So Mr. BACON's amendment to Mr. ALLISON's amendment was rejected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question now recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to be inserted after the word "courts," in line 9 of the pending amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin to the amendment will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. At the end of Mr. ALLISON's amendment it is proposed to insert the following:

Every Federal judge who owns any share of the capital stock or any of the bonds of a common carrier subject to the provisions of this act, or who accepts or uses, or who procures for the use of any person, any pass or privilege for transportation withheld from any other person, is hereby disqualified and prohibited from hearing or passing upon as such judge any motion, question, application, proceeding, or from presiding at or hearing any trial arising under the provisions of this act.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I should like to have the yeas and nays on that amendment, Mr. President.

I understand, from queries within my hearing, that many Senators do not understand what the amendment is, Mr. President, and, if I am in order, I should like to explain it just in a word, or I will ask to have the amendment again read, in order that it may be understood.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be again read.

The Secretary again read the amendment proposed by Mr. LA FOLLETTE to Mr. ALLISON's amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the law now precludes any member of the Interstate Commerce Commission from holding or owning any stocks or bonds in any railroad company subject to the provisions of this act. Why the courts or the judges who are to review the proceedings of the Commission here should not be likewise barred from ownership of the stocks or bonds of any railroad company subject to the provisions of this act, I am at a loss to understand.

In addition to that, my proposed amendment would disqualify any Federal judge from hearing any motion, presiding at any trial, or deciding any question affecting an interstate railroad where such judge has accepted a railroad pass or has procured railroad passes for others. Any judge who does that now violates the interstate-commerce law. I assert that there are Federal judges who are accepting and using passes in this country to-day in violation of law.

No judge should be permitted to hear, try, and determine a case under a statute the provisions of which he is himself guilty of violating.

Since I have offered this amendment Senators on this floor have informed me of specific instances where Federal judges have procured passes for members of their families; of other cases where they have been furnished private cars and transportation for large parties, in violation of the positive but somewhat weak provisions of existing statute. It offends one's sense of justice as well as propriety, and in every such case the law should disqualify the judge from acting.

If any Senator upon this floor can find a good reason for saying that a judge who is to determine any question arising under this bill, when it shall become a law, should be interested in the property of the railroad company that is to be affected by the question of rates involved, I should like to have him rise in his place and proclaim it now. There is not a lawyer on this floor who in any suit against a railway company would be willing to submit the case of his client to a jury of twelve men with railroad passes in their pockets. Neither should a judge who receives favors from a railroad company be permitted to try any case in which the interests of the railroad company are involved.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I have some respect for the judiciary of the United States. I think there ought to be a halt in the Senate somewhere, so I move to lay the amendment upon the table, and upon that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine to lay the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] on the table, on which motion the Senator from Maine demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LATIMER (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. PLATT]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 40, nays 27, as follows:

YEAS—40.

Aldrich	Clapp	Frye	Millard
Alger	Clark, Wyo.	Fulton	Nixon
Allee	Cullom	Gamble	Perkins
Allison	Dick	Hale	Piles
Ankeny	Dillingham	Hansbrough	Scott
Brandegee	Dolliver	Hopkins	Smoot
Bulkeley	Dryden	Kean	Spooner
Burnham	Elkins	Kittredge	Sutherland
Burrows	Flint	Lodge	Warner
Carter	Foraker	Long	Wetmore

NAYS—27.

Bacon	Daniel	McCreary	Rayner
Bailey	Dubois	McCumber	Simmons
Berry	Foster	McLaurin	Stone
Blackburn	Frazier	Martin	Taliaferro
Clarke, Ark.	Gallinger	Morgan	Teller
Clay	Gearin	Newlands	Tillman
Culberson	La Follette	Overman

NOT VOTING—22.

Beveridge	Depew	McEnery	Pettus
Burkett	Gorman	Mallory	Platt
Burton	Hemenway	Money	Proctor
Carmack	Heyburn	Nelson	Warren
Clark, Mont.	Knox	Patterson
Crane	Latimer	Penrose

So the motion of Mr. HALE to lay Mr. LA FOLLETTE's amendment to the amendment of Mr. ALLISON on the table was agreed to.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I am exceedingly anxious to bring this bill to a vote, and I would not intrude on the Senate or present an amendment which has practically been voted down three times already were it not for the purpose of making a statement. I send to the desk an amendment which I offer.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina will be stated.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is to be added to the amendment now pending proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

The SECRETARY. After the word "courts," on line 9 of the printed amendment offered by Mr. ALLISON, it is proposed to insert:

And if such court shall find that the order was beyond the authority of the Commission or was a violation of the constitutional rights of the carrier, it shall issue an injunction against the enforcement thereof.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, the paternity of that idea will probably never be wholly known. I have my opinion as to what brain coined that exact language, but, without positive evidence, I am unwilling to declare who was its originator. It is known as the "Long amendment." It followed a conference of Senators at the White House and was introduced in this body two or three days after that by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. LONG]—I mean that the amendment I now submit is in substance the Long amendment, the central idea involved being the same.

The Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] this morning, in his earnest defense and eulogium of the President, declared that the President need not—I believe I quote his words correctly—have conferred with Senators at all. That is the substance of what he said; but the Senator must know, because he himself has been to the White House and been talked to by the President on this business, that the President has conferred with a great many Senators about this matter. There will be some surprise when I say to the Senate that, through another, the President has conferred with the Senator from South Carolina who is now speaking. [Laughter.] It is, therefore, somewhat in the nature of a confession, as well as to give some of the inside history of recent events connected with this legislation, that I now take the floor to offer this amendment.

My Lord Bacon, in those famous essays of his, has declared that "Reading maketh a full man, conference a ready man, and writing an exact man." Senators know that I seldom or never write anything to be read in this Chamber. When I want to communicate to those who are listening I almost always speak the words that come without choice. Very often they are badly spoken or, rather, badly put together, but they at least convey my opinion and feeling at that particular moment. In order that I might be careful to misstate nothing and to be certain in my facts, I have written out the account of my negotiations with the President of the United States.

On Saturday evening, March 31, 1906, I was informed by ex-Senator William E. Chandler that President Roosevelt had sent to him a note asking him to call at the White House that evening; that he had obeyed the call, and had been told by the President that he desired through him to get into communication with me as the Senator in charge of the railroad rate bill, and with Senator BAILEY, representing the Democrats of the Senate, for the purpose of ascertaining whether there could be such united action among the friends in the Senate of the Hepburn bill as would make a sure majority in its favor and against injurious amendments. Mr. Chandler said that the President named various Republican Senators who he thought were true friends of the bill, but said that it might require nearly all the Democrats to defeat obnoxious amendments. Mr. Chandler said the President had stated that he had come to a complete disagreement with the Senatorial lawyers who were trying to injure or defeat the bill by ingenious constitutional arguments, naming Senator KNOX in addition to Senators SPOONER and FORAKER [laughter]; that the President stated carefully and deliberately the basis upon which he thought there should be cooperation, viz: An amendment expressly granting a court review, but limiting it to two points; (1) an inquiry whether the Commission had acted beyond its authority—ultra vires was his expression—and (2) whether it had violated the constitutional rights of the carrier. Mr. Chandler stated that the President repeated that he had reached a final decision that the right of review should be thus limited, that thus far he would go and no farther; that his decision would be unalterable.

Mr. Chandler further said he told the President he believed it highly probable that the greater part of the Democrats would join in the President's limitation of the powers of the court, but that Mr. BAILEY and myself would urge in addition some prohibition of the courts from issuing ex parte injunctions; and he said that the President stopped him, saying that he need not enlarge upon his point, because he was heartily in favor of such a restriction of injunctions.

On the next day, Sunday, April 1, I repeated to Senator BAILEY Mr. Chandler's statements, and that day or Monday morning informed Mr. Chandler that we did not believe there would be any difficulty in coming to an understanding on the basis proposd by the President; and on the evening of Monday Mr. Chandler told me he had so assured the President and asked him not to be disturbed by the newspaper items growing out of the talk about Senator LONG's amendment, published in the newspapers as one agreed upon at a White House conference on Saturday.

Mr. Chandler and I continued to see each other every day, and on April 5 I told him of the existing situation; that there was no trouble and that progress was being made; and he went to the White House to make a favorable report to the President. On Saturday, April 7, I was called to South Carolina, but saw Mr. Chandler and gave him the substance of an interview with Mr. BAILEY on that day, which had indicated that everything was going on as we could wish.

On Wednesday, April 11, I had a full talk with Mr. Chandler, who afterwards on that day informed me he had reported to the President. Mr. Chandler told me that he had on April 8 conferred with Senator ALLISON and had asked him to intervene in the conferences that were going on, and that Mr. ALLISON had agreed to do so, and that the President had seen Senator ALLISON about it.

On April 13 Mr. Chandler informed me that he was sure that Mr. BAILEY and I had better confer not wholly with him, but also with Attorney-General Moody, as a representative of the President and his trusted adviser, on the law points involved.

Therefore, on April 15, by an arrangement made by Mr. Chandler, Mr. BAILEY and I had a long conference with Mr. Moody, in which we found ourselves in perfect accord with him, except that there was a difference of opinion on the question whether the prohibition of injunction should be only until after notice and hearing, and not necessarily until the final decision of the case. There was absolute accord from the first on the proposition that the court review should be limited to the inquiry whether the Commission had exceeded its authority or violated the carrier's constitutional rights.

After talking over the whole case, Mr. Moody said: "I will send you what I understand to be the kind of an amendment we can agree on, and which I think he will accept." Mr. Moody on the following day sent a typewritten draft of a memorandum of our joint views to Mr. BAILEY, and I have the original here.

The morning after the Democratic conference I went to see Mr. Moody alone and told him not to be alarmed by the newspaper reports; that we could, I felt sure, get 26 votes, and possibly 1 or 2 more, for the proposed amendment, and if the President was certain of 20 Republican votes it was a sure thing. Subsequently Mr. Chandler made another appointment with Mr. Moody, and Mr. BAILEY and I saw him at the Department of Justice. The conference was brief, and one or two slight verbal changes were made in the proposed amendment, and everything was agreed upon, the understanding being that we would work together with the President to get the necessary votes to pass it. Mr. Moody expressed the doubt whether President Roosevelt could get enough Republicans to pass the Bailey proviso, but felt sure the Overman amendment would go. But he declared it to be the President's fixed purpose to insist on the Long amendment as to a narrow court review.

With this draft made by Mr. Moody before me, I prepared a brief amendment, which was offered in the Senate on May 3. The day before I had talked with Senator ALLISON concerning such a condensed amendment, and on the morning of the 3d I sent to him a copy, with a letter, he being then sick at the Portland.

During the period covered by this statement—from March 31 to May 4—Mr. BAILEY and I made constant efforts to learn the sentiments of Democratic Senators, and also conferred with a few Republicans, and we informed Mr. Chandler and Mr. Moody that there was no doubt of the passage through the Senate of the amendment under consideration if the President would adhere to his programme. We had no suspicion that any change was intended until the afternoon of May 4, when the President summoned the thirty-six newspaper correspondents to see and hear him at the White House.

Mr. President, I ask to have the draft of this amendment, prepared by Mr. Moody after conference with Mr. BAILEY and myself, and amended by Mr. Moody at the second conference in one particular as to words and in another particular by Mr. BAILEY as to words, but not changing the substance at all, printed in the RECORD.

Several SENATORS. Have it read.

Mr. TILLMAN. Let it be read. This stuff has been bandied about so extensively it is almost nauseating to hear it any more. But I will let it go in.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

AMENDMENT TO THE HEPBURN BILL.

First. Strike out the words "fairly remunerative" wherever they occur.

Second. Allow the bill to stand in the respect of providing for maximum rates only.

Third. Adopt an amendment which is a composite of the amendment printed in Collier's on March 24—the Long amendment—and the Bailey amendment of March 21, as follows:

"That the orders of the Commission, except orders for the payment of money, shall take effect within such reasonable time as shall be prescribed by the Commission, and shall continue for such period of time, not exceeding two years, as shall be prescribed in the order of the Commission, unless sooner set aside by the Commission, or by a court in a suit brought by any carrier, person, or corporation, party to the complaint, affected by the order of the Commission, against the Commission in the circuit court of the United States, sitting as a court of equity in the district wherein any carrier party to said suit has its principal operating office; and jurisdiction is hereby conferred on the circuit courts of the United States to hear and determine in any such suit whether the order complained of was beyond the authority of the Commission or in violation of the rights of the carrier secured by the Constitution; and if, upon the hearing, the court shall find that the order complained of was beyond the authority of the Commission or in violation of the rights of the carrier secured by the Constitution, it shall enjoin the enforcement of the same: Provided, however, That no order of the Commission shall be set aside or suspended by any preliminary or interlocutory decree or order of the court. Said proceedings shall have precedence over all other cases on the docket of a different character, and the court shall have power to make orders to secure the attendance of persons from any part of the United States, and the existing laws relative to evidence and proceedings under the acts to regulate commerce shall be applicable. Either party to said proceeding shall have the right to appeal directly to the Supreme Court of the United States, and such appeal shall have precedence in said Supreme Court over all other cases of a different character pending therein.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. TILLMAN. I ask unanimous consent to complete my statement.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Carolina? The Chair hears none. The Senator will proceed.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will not impose on the good nature and courtesy of the Senate.

On Friday night, I believe it was—yes, Friday night—after the correspondents had been called to the White House, and the President had notified the country that he was now getting all he wanted in the then baby Allison amendment, which has grown considerably since, but which at that time, I believe, embraced only the clause giving jurisdiction to the court to hear and determine such suits—at that time that was the breadth to which the little fellow had grown—I heard of this—I will not say surrender. I am waiting to find out what it was. Well, I will not say anything. I will just go along and state the facts. I heard of this at dinner, about 7 o'clock. One of the newspaper men who had been in the Cabinet room came to my hotel and reported what had occurred. He had met Senator Chandler on the street, and they had come in together.

I will say here that the Senator was much more excited than I was over it. As soon as I finished eating, we two, having been, you might say, conspirators together, if it was conspiracy, went to see my colleague, the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY]. He was equally innocent of any knowledge, except what he had heard on the street on his way home. And then, wishing to get at the third or fourth conspirator, we went immediately to the residence of Mr. Moody. He was absolutely innocent of any knowledge of any such purpose on the part of the President, and so stated. He was preparing to leave when we reached his residence, and left for the South or somewhere on a visit of rest and recuperation. So the opportunity to get fuller facts from him did not occur.

Now, when it is recalled that my relations to the President are unfriendly, that I have been severely criticised in this Chamber because in pursuing an argument on another point I had made some allusions to him that, possibly, were not altogether Senatorial or in consonance with the amity and good relations that ought to exist between the Senate and the Executive, and that I had been called down by the Senator from Maine and others, it can readily be understood that when the ex-Senator from New Hampshire, who is a warm personal friend of mine, came to me with a notice that the President had sent for him, and then returning said he had sent for him for the purpose of getting in touch with the Democrats, to get their help, I thought very seriously for a while before I would consent to pocket my pride and lay aside my just indignation for a past wrong, as I considered it; but having regard for my duty, in charge of a great legislative bill, affecting the rights of the entire country, I decided it to be necessary for me to cooperate and help Theodore Roosevelt pass a good railroad law.

I have conferred, as I said in the statement, with several Republicans. The day I think Senator ALLISON was taken sick I showed him this amendment of mine. He said, "I think that is all right, except that we can hardly get votes enough for the Bailey proviso; but we will, I think, be sure to carry the Overman amendment." The next day I showed it to the junior Senator from Iowa, and he assured me that there were twenty-two Republicans sure for the amendment which I sent to the desk a moment ago, limiting the court review to questions involving the authority of the Commission and the constitutional rights of the carrier.

It therefore follows that I had every assurance that there were enough votes in the Senate on the two sides, laying aside all partisanship and coming together to discharge a great public duty, to secure the passage through the Senate of such provisions in the Hepburn bill as would guarantee the business interests of the country against interference and destruction by the judges in the work of beneficent work which we hoped that the Commission would do.

I shall not pursue the argument. I presume it is useless. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] has resumed control of the Republicans. He shakes his head. That may be due to his modesty, or the fact that he has come nearer being unhorsed and thrown into the ditch in this struggle than ever before since I have been here. All the same, I repeat it.

I do not know whether it be partisanship and a desire that the Republicans should all line up, or whether the timid ones, who have been considering very seriously their duty to their constituents and were therefore anxious and willing to get behind the President and would therefore have voted for this provision, are not now rejoiced that Theodore Roosevelt gets between them and the people and says, as he has said in the dispatch to the legislative committee of the State Grange of Pennsylvania, that he has obtained all he ever desired to obtain.

The Senator from Texas, by repeated quotations from his messages and speeches, has demonstrated that the President has absolutely given up his contention in regard to the breadth of the court review. I will ask to have this printed—this dispatch which has been read by all and therefore it is not necessary to read it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the dispatch will be printed.

The dispatch is as follows:

WASHINGTON, May 6, 1906.

W. F. HILL AND MEMBERS LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE,
Pennsylvania State Grange, Harrisburg, Pa.:

Telegram received. I am happy to tell you that not only am I standing on my original position as regards rate legislation, but it seems likely that Congress will take this position, too.

The Hepburn bill meets my views, as I have from the beginning stated. The Allison amendment is only declaratory of what the Hepburn bill must mean, supposing it to be constitutional, and no genuine friend of the bill can object to it without stultifying himself.

In addition, I should be glad to get certain amendments, such as those commonly known as the Long and Overman amendments, but they are not vital, and even without them the Hepburn bill, with the Allison amendment, contains practically exactly what I have both originally and always since asked for, and if enacted into law it will represent the longest step ever yet taken in the direction of solving the railway rate problem.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

Mr. TILLMAN. But I want to call attention to the fact that in the message delivered to us on May 4, the day before these interesting occurrences took place, the President of the United States, in writing those burning words which have been flashed all over the United States about the Standard Oil trust, used these words:

It is impossible to work a material improvement in conditions such as above described merely through the instrumentality of a lawsuit. A lawsuit is often a necessary method, but by itself it is an utterly inadequate method. What is needed is the conferring upon the Commission of ample affirmative power, so conferred as to make its decisions take effect at once, subject only to such action by the court as is demanded by the Constitution.

The broad review which has been contended for from the first by the Senator from Rhode Island, the review which gives the court the right to determine whether the Commission has fixed a just and reasonable rate without regard to its having invaded the constitutional rights of the carrier, has been yielded by the President, if I know anything about the English language, and, although he reiterated his views the day before he sent for the newspaper correspondents, he now says, and his friends here say, that there is practically no change, no difference; and yet we have been kept here for four months debating this proposition. We had won our fight, as I believe, and would be to-day in possession of the majority of the Senate, to put those words into the bill, if the President had stood fast by his oft-repeated assertion of his desire and purpose and that he would not yield one jot or tittle.

As for the treatment of me, as for the failure to say to those with whom he had sought to enter into negotiations that he had changed his mind, the failure to notify, I suppose, although

I do not know, the Attorney-General that he had changed his mind; that negotiations were off; that he could get all he wanted from the Republicans without any help from us, I shall say nothing. I leave the facts to go to the country and let the people of the United States judge whether Theodore Roosevelt is entitled to the glory and honor of the rate legislation originally conceived by the Democratic convention in the last three campaigns and demanded in our platforms; whether we have not missed a golden opportunity to enact a really effective law and thus give the relief which the people demand. Whatever be the outcome the fact remains that had the Senate been left to itself this bill would be a great deal better than is now possible.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I feel, as we approach the conclusion of this discussion, that it is due the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] that expression be given to the general appreciation in this Chamber of his uniform courtesy and good temper in the conduct of the bill under consideration. That the Senator from South Carolina has worked industriously for the achievement of the result sought no one will question, here or elsewhere. I feel that in the light of the paper he has just read and the exhibit made in connection with it that the general well-being of the country and the gayety of nations would be greatly increased if I were to ask unanimous consent that the Hon. William E. Chandler, late a Senator from the State of New Hampshire, be given the privileges of the floor for the remainder of the debate. However, inasmuch as that request would be somewhat unusual. I withhold it, notwithstanding the fact that I am quite sure the ex-Senator from New Hampshire would make a contribution to current parliamentary literature very interesting, if not instructive.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I shall be more than delighted to hear what the ex-Senator from New Hampshire, Hon. William E. Chandler, has to say about this, and I should also like to hear from Theodore Roosevelt and William H. Moody.

Mr. CARTER. I have no doubt that Mr. Chandler will be heard from, and, perchance, the President and the Attorney-General will likewise give the incident such notice as may seem to them appropriate.

The papers presented by the Senator from South Carolina in substance mean that the President was anxious from the beginning to maintain the integrity of the Hepburn bill as it came from the House. Finding that this could be done without amendment other than inserting a mere interpretation in the matter of jurisdiction, he was content with that. As the bill stands under the so-called "Allison amendment," the matter of jurisdiction is interpolated merely for the purpose of interpreting and making clear that which it is insisted was in the bill from the beginning.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] desired, apparently, to avoid the issue, although unconsciously, I think. With his usual display of mental acumen he undertook to differentiate between jurisdiction and court power and the restraining of courts from granting temporary injunctions. All of the quotations to which the Senator referred in his speech upon yesterday, beginning on page 6873 of the RECORD, go to the question of the President's position with reference to the orders of the Commission standing until set aside by a final adjudication in court. That goes to the exercise of court power and jurisdiction. The President's position, to my mind, has been consistent from the beginning. It has been my privilege to hear an expression of his views, and on every occasion he has insisted that the bill as it came from the House was, in his judgment, the best possible legislation that could be secured upon the subject. Finding that amendments were offered in such vast volume in the Senate, it is no wonder the President sought to restrict in some manner the adoption of amendments and the utter confusion and ruin of the bill.

I take it that the Senator from Texas did himself little credit in attempting to evade the issue by claiming that he was not discussing the jurisdiction of the courts on the occasion of his assault upon the President. The subject-matter to which he referred related practically to that subject only. The Senator sought to make answer to some observations I thought proper to submit by referring to me as an inconspicuous member of this body in connection with this measure. It is true I have been here but a brief space of time, and I at once disclaim any purpose to indulge in such lofty pretensions as the Senator from Texas arrogates to himself. I would prefer, Mr. President, in every walk and relation of life to occupy the position of an unobtrusive citizen or official performing duties as they arise, rather than to seek special distinction by walking about wrapped in a mantle of egotism and strutting through an atmosphere of vanity, considering all other men as puny pigmies. I believe it is the right and privilege of any Senator to refer in this Chamber to a public record, and I at once and cheerfully ascribe to any Senator the privilege of making a personal allusion when only public records are involved. I have been inconspicuous in connection with this legislation, but I would prefer the inconspicuous position rather than to assume the burden attached to some Senators who have been more conspicuous in offering certain amendments to this bill.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] misquoted what I said in order to make it a little easier to answer it. I did not describe him as an inconspicuous member of this body. What I said was that his services in reconciling Republican differences had been inconspicuous, and he might just as well treat himself to the novel sensation of being accurate once in a while.

Mr. President, I shall not allow myself drawn into a debate over what I think of my own capacity. It is true I do not go through the world wringing my hands and begging everybody's pardon because I happen to be in their way. It is true I maintain my opinions with some persistence and occasionally with a regrettable degree of dogmatism. But there is a vast difference, sir, between egotism and dogmatism. I have always believed that egotism is an offensive trait; but I do not believe that a lack of confidence on the part of any man who aspires to a seat in the Senate of the United States in the correctness of his own views is a special qualification for service in this body. If a Senator does not have confidence in his own views, in God's name how can he ask the people of a State to give him one-half of their authority in this, the greatest legislative assembly in the world?

Every man who announces himself as a candidate for the Senate testifies to the people whose suffrage he seeks a high degree of confidence in his own ability. The man who tells me that he does not value his own judgment, and yet asks the people to clothe him with the dignity of this great office, confesses that he seeks an office which he thinks himself incapable of filling. I do not belong to that class. I have never sought an office I did not think myself qualified to fill, and I never shall.

If it pleases the Senator to provoke—no, I will not use that word, because no Senator shall provoke me into a debate of that kind—a personal exchange, this is not the place to give the provocation. If one Senator entertains toward another a feeling which leads to personal and offensive criticism, it ought to be given vent at other times and in other places. This Senate Chamber shall never be the scene of a disorderly personal debate between me and any other Senator. With this I dismiss the allusion of the Senator from Montana, who began the attempt at personal controversy in his previous speech.

I shall only detain the Senate long enough now to say that what the Senator from South Carolina has said as to my connection with what we will call this unfortunate misunderstanding between him and the President is correct. I did not myself interview ex-Senator Chandler, and I derived all the information I have as to the messages of the President through Senator Chandler to the Senator from South Carolina from the Senator from South Carolina alone.

When I was invited to go with him to discuss with the Attorney-General this matter, I replied that I was willing to discuss a law question with the law officer of the Government; that while I had always declined and while I should continue to decline discussing with any member of the executive branch of the Government the propriety or the wisdom of legislation in Congress, I was willing to discuss with the Attorney-General the question of law involved in the amendment which I had proposed.

I went with the Senator from South Carolina to the Department of Justice, and I discussed at some length and with a result entirely satisfactory the legal question with the Attorney-General. I said to him what every Senator on this floor has known from the beginning, that my deepest concern in respect to a court review is to protect the orders of the Commission from judicial interference until the court is ready to render a final judgment, and as I understand it these suggestions and this amendment which the Senator from South Carolina has read were not only drawn by the Attorney-General, but were approved by the President before they were transmitted to me. As this paper came to me it included what is known as my anti-injunction amendment, word for word, as it was taken out of the amendment on the subject of a court review which I had presented to the Senate. It was not even changed to conform to the new court provision which the Attorney-General had drawn, and the pencil line which has been drawn through certain words I drew myself. In order to make that part of the amendment conform to what had preceded it, I added the words "or order" in lieu of what I had stricken out, and in the second interview that change was approved by the Attorney-General.

Mr. President, I hope the Senate and the country will draw one moral from this disagreeable affair. I hope it will tend to convince Senators and citizens of the vast importance of preserving forever and completely the separation between the several departments of this Government, for as surely as the Executive calls legislators to a conference with him, misunderstandings will arise; and as surely as the Executive is permitted to influence the judgment of legislators, just that surely and just that far they violate the spirit and the letter of this splendid system.

This misunderstanding will probably be fruitful of some good, which shall in the years to come outweigh the evil which has resulted from it. I would rather see this bill defeated until a new judgment could be taken from the people upon it; I would rather see the court amendment as broad as the English language can make it, and that would not be broader than you gentlemen have made it now; I would rather suffer any single evil, than to see the great, separate, and independent departments of this Government brought under the dominion of a single will.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, I would not feel any disposition to take a part in such a controversy as is now going on if the honorable Senator from South Carolina had not appeared, at least, to call me as one of his witnesses. I have been engaged in this rate discussion now for a good deal over a year. I never sought any responsibility in connection with it, but found that responsibility upon me as a member of the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate.

I do not intend to indulge a tone of criticism, much less of scolding, but I can not forbear to say that we have spent nearly a year magnifying the little questions connected with the railway problem and treating with neglect the substantial questions which are involved. I said more than a year ago in this Chamber that we ought promptly to pass a bill in pursuance of the recommendation of the President. I did everything possible to induce the Senate to take that action at the second session of the last Congress, and, in common with others, spent the whole spring and nearly the whole summer helping to discharge the business which the Senate laid upon the Interstate Commerce Committee.

We are now advanced to the concluding stages of this controversy, and as I reflect upon it the thing that impresses me most is that this bill, which is a very simple and a very complete response to the petition of the business community and to the recommendations of the President of the United States, has had almost as much trouble from its friends as it has had from its enemies.

It has had to stand fire from two directions—from the camp of its opponents and from the scattered tents which shelter its adherents. The fact that it has escaped the steady fusilade of the one and the random shots of the other is not only an unusual fortune of war, but a gratifying evidence that it is made of proper stuff. In the first place it has survived the criticism of the constitutional lawyers. I do not underestimate their powers, nor their influence in a deliberative body like this.

Here is the only spot in the world where no limits are ever set on the learning of the profession. The courts protect themselves against such inundations of legal lore; while we all bow, with the multitude, before these displays of forensic genius which enthrall the Senate and enchain the galleries till, like our great ancestor conversing in the garden, we forget all time. Fortunately this bill was prepared to stand the siege guns of constitutional lawyers. It was drawn on lines laid down in the great decisions of our courts. The worst fate that could befall it in the judgment seat would only teach the American people what steps to take to accomplish the work which they have in hand. Therefore they can await the outcome of judicial proceedings with an equal mind. To have the measure vetoed by the Supreme Court is one thing; to have it overwhelmed in the Senate Chamber by the onset of constitutional lawyers is quite another. That fate it has happily escaped, for the champions of the Constitution, whose combined attack might have been ruinous to the measure, have spent their time refuting one another, introducing here an intellectual Kilkennyism never before seen in the Senate of the United States.

Senators have begun speeches by denouncing the measure as unconstitutional and ended by declaring their purpose to vote for it, as if the proverb read, "Be sure you are wrong, and then go ahead." A Senator who is against the bill made a speech for it, while another who is for it made a speech against it. A Senator who has gone over the measure three times in elaborate arguments finds no soundness in it, sees in every section the mangled remains of the Constitution, seriously proposes to take a little bill of his own and tuck it in tenderly by the side of these wicked and repugnant offenses against constitutional government as an alternative remedy.

And so the conflict has raged from day to day, from week to week, from month to month, and, as the end of the struggle approaches, the friends of this measure can join in the admiration of the prowess of the legal gladiators, without concealing their gratitude that in the confusion the bill itself has escaped without material injury.

These rival detective agencies of the law that have been shadowing the Constitution all winter are about to be retired from business so far as this bill is concerned. We are surely in no position to regret that the President of the United States has been willing to take the leadership of this controversy, a post which he has occupied from its very beginning.

It is no use to reproach my friend from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] and my friend from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] because they did not worry themselves about interstate commerce while they were in the House of Representatives. That is an attack on nearly everybody, but it simply illustrates the fact that when these personalities begin to intrude you can not tell who is going to get into difficulty.

Few of either party exhibited any activity in the House of Representatives or anywhere else, because everybody knows that the entire attention of the American people was for five years preoccupied by the war with Spain and the problems that grew out of it, and it is no particular reproach to anybody that he did not become excited about other questions.

We can trace the new public interest in this question and all kindred questions to the leadership of the President of the United States. I have described it on this floor as the most superb moral leadership that this generation has had, and I rejoice that his hold on the affection and the good will of the American people is so complete that not even the eloquence of my friend from Texas can disturb their confidence either in his integrity or in his sagacity.

Now, Mr. President, I do not intend to enter into a discussion of the law applicable to the amendments which have been offered by my honored colleague, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON]. He has been my counselor and my guide in these undertakings ever since I have given attention to them. For more than forty years he has devoted his life to the services of the American people, and I do not propose to permit it to be said that he either has allowed himself to be misled or has misled anybody else in connection with this matter.

The original Hepburn bill omitted any affirmative words conferring jurisdiction on the courts. It did so designedly. I will say to my honored friend from Texas that that omission was made with the knowledge and advice of one of the greatest lawyers in the State of Texas, a man whose fame as a jurist has been won in the courts. Night after night we sat up together and gave our entire attention to the problems with which we have to deal in this bill. We agreed that nobody knows exactly what the courts of the United States will do with an order of the Commission; but we agreed that whatever they may do their jurisdiction does not depend on the language of this bill conferring it. Therefore, aside from providing the venue of the suits and distinctly providing that the orders of the Commission may be set aside or suspended by a court of competent jurisdiction, we said nothing. But the bill was drawn with the distinct understanding that the courts of the United States have in relation to these orders a jurisdiction which the Congress can not abridge in any way.

My honored colleague [Mr. ALLISON] yesterday stated the whole law of this case. He has not won very great fame as a constitutional lawyer, but he has been in contact with the business of the Government of the United States long enough to know more about legislation and the problems connected with it than any man who has occupied a seat in this Chamber in our generation, and with that intuitive common sense which he applies to every question he went right to the root of this matter.

What are we doing? We are exercising the power of Congress over interstate commerce. What is this order of the Commission when it is made and the rate which it fixes? Taken with the statute which authorizes it, it is the act of the Congress of the United States, and the position of the courts in respect to it is exactly the position which the courts occupy toward every other act of Congress. It does not lie with them to supervise the wisdom of it. It does not lie with them to pass upon the public policy of it. It does not lie with them to rewrite it. It lies with them only to judge of its conformity to the supreme law. Therefore these amendments which my honored colleague has offered have only put affirmatively into the Hepburn bill the jurisdiction which its friends have from the beginning claimed that it conferred upon the courts. They have given heed to the argument made by my honored friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], who pointed out that while a suit was apparently intended, there was no defendant in sight, and that it would greatly strengthen the bill from a legal standpoint if a positive statement of the jurisdiction was made in the bill itself.

Whoever says that the President of the United States has surrendered anything impeaches a courage which needs no defense before the American people. Neither ought we to listen without protest to the suggestion that the President of the United States has been trapped. He is surrounded by official advisers who are great lawyers—great constitutional lawyers, if you please—and he needs no indorsement here, when he says to the American people that these amendments leave the Hepburn bill exactly as he desires it to be left, with that jurisdiction in the courts of which no act of Congress can deprive them.

The very object of this bill is to get the judgment of somebody wholly removed from the bias of interest as to what the rate ought to be and to give the finding effect within a reasonable time. The courts have steadfastly refused to assume that duty, because the act of establishing a rate is a power expressly conferred upon Congress. This bill creates a Commission to do that business, because, even if the courts had the power to do it, it is not within the field of their training and experience. We create the Commission, therefore, in order that this work may be done by men specially qualified to do it. The bill increases the number of the Commissioners, and pays salaries nearly equal to the compensation of our highest courts. The questions involved are not questions of law. They concern the practical adjustment of everyday affairs of business, yet men stand here gravely and declare that a direct recognition of the jurisdiction of the circuit court to hear a suit brought to vacate one of these orders takes all findings of the Commission and subjects them to the scrutiny of a judge in order that its mistakes may be brought into chancery and exposed to the vicissitudes of an interminable lawsuit.

While it may be regretted that this discussion has been so largely given over to a battle of the law books, the outcome of it has not been as disastrous as might have been anticipated. For expositors of the Constitution, equally famous in American public life, while they have not convinced one another, have made everybody's position comfortable and everybody's opinion respectable.

If they have not simplified the transaction in which we are engaged, they have at least given us an opportunity to simplify it for ourselves. It does not require a law library to ascertain the limitations which must guide the work which we are trying to do. The power to regulate interstate commerce is confided to Congress, and to no other department of the Government. Whatever else may be said about the Commission which we are creating, the act which they perform becomes a part of the act of Congress through which they derive their authority, and the rate which they fix, in the language of Mr. Justice Miller, becomes the law of the land as completely as if Congress had established it without the intervention of an administrative board. Therefore the courts have exactly the same relation which they have to other acts of Congress and can be given no other jurisdiction over it.

This bill responds to the petition of the business community of America. It responds to the recommendations of the President of the United States. It will have the approval of the American people; and the President of the United States makes no surrender when he gives to it in the form in which it will pass this body his unreserved approbation.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, it is my purpose to say a word on this occasion, without any invective or without any sarcasm or any attempt at humor.

Mr. President, when the smoke of this struggle shall have passed away, when the written provisions of this bill shall have been submitted to the American people, through the exercise of their own judgment upon it, instead of taking the dictum of members of this Senate as to what the bill means, Theodore Roosevelt will be recognized as having achieved the greatest moral victory in all the moral victories which have stamped him so conspicuously as an ideal American citizen.

When this bill came from the House of Representatives and was in the Committee on Interstate Commerce of the Senate, I was one who voted to bring the bill out upon the theory, as I believed then and believe now after weeks of weary and ofttimes dreary debate, that it was above the power of Congress in legislation to restrict or enlarge those rights which are guaranteed under the Constitution, and that the right of the carrier under this bill to go into court and defend his property rights exists not because written into this bill, but because it exists under the Constitution of our country.

There was one thing in this bill which I always regretted as an omission, and that was the failure to name the Commission distinctively and affirmatively as the party against whom the suit should be brought. In the process of discussion it came that that suggestion was made; in the process of discussion it came that the amendment which, for brevity's sake I shall refer to as the Long amendment, was suggested; in the process of discussion it came that the amendment, to which I shall refer as the Allison amendment, was also suggested; and I say to-day, Mr. President, that it may go into the RECORD and go as a prophecy that when the hysteria of this hour has passed away, when the American people, laymen and lawyers alike, shall read the statute as it will be printed, the American people will realize, as Theodore Roosevelt and the Republican members of this Senate realize, that in the essentials of this bill there has been no change whatever.

It was the demand of the people, accentuated and emphasized and crystallized by the President's message, that the Interstate Commerce Commission should be given power, not only to condemn an existing rate, but to name a rate which should take its place—a power which they lacked under the law of 1887. It was also insisted that the order of the Commission should go into effect, throwing upon the carrier the burden of relieving itself from that order if the order violated a constitutional right. Those two basic principles are wrought into this bill, and are wrought into it so plainly that no man can misread them.

I join somewhat with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] that much of this constitutional debate has been among the shadows and in the clouds, and, I maintain, as I did in the opening of this debate, that it is beyond our power to either restrict or enlarge the constitutional guaranties.

Now, one word in regard to the President himself. When this matter reached this point, there were three things which Theodore Roosevelt might have done. He might have stood back and said: "It is not for me to discuss the details of this legislation; I have said what the country requires, what the interests of the country demand, and you must work out the details;" but that would have been a cowardly position, inconsistent with the courage of Theodore Roosevelt. He might have taken, sir, another position. He might have built himself still greater and drawn himself still nearer to the American heart had he wanted to play the part of a demagogue and stand back upon private expressions, and have said: "The Hepburn bill, without change of line or letter;" and the American people, sir, would have believed in his attitude in that respect, that it was wrong to amend the bill. If he had been playing for popular favor, that is what he might have done. But that would have been inconsistent with the character of Theodore Roosevelt; and with that resolute fixity of purpose which has so characterized the man, he took hold of this matter. He knew, undoubtedly, had he stopped to think—which I doubt, for I do not believe the man counts the cost in popular favor, one way or the other, when duty points the way—but if he did at all, he must have realized that on the floor of this body, in the excitement and the frenzy of this hour, it would be charged that a great change had been wrought in this bill; but, sir, fearlessly and resolutely facing that proposition, he took the responsibility for this in the telegram issued, I think, last Saturday.

I want to predict to-day, Mr. President, on this floor, that, when the frenzy of this hour shall have passed away, when the American people in calmness shall judge his action, they will recognize in his courage in facing what might be criticism of his political and personal enemies, one of the most splendid exhibitions of courage in his character and career, distinguished for courage. For, Mr. President, after all, the supreme test of greatness is to be great enough to be greater than self.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] in offering his amendment stated that it was the amendment that I had printed some weeks since. In this the Senator from South Carolina is mistaken, just as the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] was mistaken when he said that the amendment which he offered was identical with the amendment I presented. That amendment was prepared, after consultation with the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], and other Senators. As first prepared, it was practically the same as what is now known as the Allison amendment. It was based upon the assumption that if the bill did not give jurisdiction to the courts over orders of the Commission, it was necessary to give that jurisdiction. I was impressed with the speech of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], in which he pointed out that the bill as it came from the House did not affirmatively give jurisdiction to the courts; and we who were in favor of the legislation admitted that if it did not give jurisdiction, or rather if it could be so construed as to prevent the jurisdiction from attaching, then the bill would be unconstitutional. So, in order to make the point plain that we did not intend to prevent a review by the courts, my amendment was prepared and presented. There were in the closing part of that amendment these words:

And jurisdiction is hereby conferred on the circuit courts of the United States to hear and determine in any such suit whether the order complained of was beyond the authority of the Commission or in violation of the rights of the carrier secured by the Constitution.

Those words were added not with the view of restricting the jurisdiction of the courts to those two questions, but for the purpose of expressing affirmatively the jurisdiction the Supreme Court had taken over orders of State commissions in cases brought before them. It was to be placed in contrast with the proposition presented by the Senator from Ohio, in which he sought to have the court, on review, consider the wisdom and the policy of the orders of the Commission. So it was that in the preparation and presentation of my amendment we sought to do nothing more than to affirmatively state that jurisdiction was conferred on the courts to review the orders of the Commission.

In the remarks that I made on this bill on the 3d of April, the day the amendment was presented, I used this language:

But I agree with the Senator from Pennsylvania that there should be no question in regard to the right of a carrier that has been injured by an order of the Commission to sue the Commission in the United States circuit court.

I do not object to an amendment authorizing suit to be brought against the Commission and conferring jurisdiction upon the United States circuit court sitting in equity to hear and determine any such suit. I believe under this bill without amendment that two questions can be inquired into by the court in a suit brought by the carrier or anyone else injured by an order of the Commission, and I am not opposed to amending the bill by defining such jurisdiction of the court. I believe that suit can be brought to set aside the order of the Commission when the Commission has acted beyond its authority, for general unlimited jurisdiction is not conferred upon the Commission to make rates. It is a body of limited jurisdiction, and the law clearly defines its duties, and it must act within the law or its actions are void. I also believe that under this bill, without amendment, if the Commission makes an order that is a violation of the rights of the carrier, which are secured by the Constitution, the court, on a suit being brought, will suspend or set aside such order; and believing that these things are in the bill now I am not opposed to making the bill clear and definite by inserting such provisions.

I then quoted the amendment I offered, and made this statement:

But I fear that this amendment will not be satisfactory to the Senator from Pennsylvania and the other Senators who are seeking to amend this bill by inserting a provision for a court review. It is not the intention of those who are insisting upon a review to insert a provision to limit the jurisdiction of the courts to the two questions suggested in this amendment. They know that the courts would assume this jurisdiction now, for they have assumed it in cases arising under State statutes and have clearly defined the length to which the courts will go in examining the orders of a subordinate tribunal. If the Commission has acted within its authority in making the order, then the rate will only be set aside by a court if it is so unreasonably low as to amount to confiscation, and a confiscatory rate has been defined to be one that does not give a fair return on the property that is employed in performing the service.

I then said, after quoting from the speeches of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] as to the kind of court reviews which they desired:

I believe that if we have a commission to which Congress gives the authority to fix maximum rates under certain restrictions, it is the duty of that commission to exercise its judgment as to the limit to be fixed, and that judgment when once exercised should not be controlled or revised by a court on review, if the commission acted within its authority, unless the rate is fixed so high as to be extortionate to the shipper or so low as to be confiscatory to the carrier.

But what the Senators from Massachusetts and Ohio desire, and what the Senator from Pennsylvania desires, if we take the provisions for court review in the document which he had printed, is to place in this bill provisions that will authorize the court to sit in judgment on the wisdom and policy of the rates made by the Commission and suspend or set them aside, not only when they are confiscatory, but when for other reasons they deem them unwise or unfair.

I also said in the same speech:

If a provision for review is placed in this bill, similar to the provisions in the different States contained in the document prepared by the Senator from Pennsylvania, one of three things will occur:

First, the United States courts will follow a course similar to that taken by the supreme court of Minnesota, decline to exercise the rate-making function, and confine their consideration of the rate, as they do now, to the question as to whether it is confiscatory, and as to whether the Commission acted within the authority of the law;

or

Second, the courts will assume the jurisdiction, and if they do, then we should not assume to confer this power on the Commission, when, in fact, it is to be exercised by the courts on review, but we should adopt the plan of the Senator from Ohio, and impose the duty on the courts in the first instance;

or

Third, the Supreme Court, following its decisions and taking a course similar to that taken by the supreme court of Kansas in the Court of Visitation case, will determine that this attempt to confer upon the courts the legislative and administrative function of fixing rates is unconstitutional, for the reason that the Constitution gives to Congress the power to regulate interstate commerce, and Congress can not transfer that power to the courts, and this provision being incorporated in a bill that might not have been enacted without it, is so closely interwoven with the other provisions of the bill that the whole act is unconstitutional and void.

If the court should take the first course under such a provision for review as is desired by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], no injury would be done and those who favor this legislation would not be disappointed; but if the court should take either the second or third course which I have designated—and I think that one of these two courses would surely be taken—then the purpose and object of this legislation would entirely fail.

And so while I believe that this bill would not be held unconstitutional in its present form, for it specifically recognizes the right of review, and can not be construed as an attempt to prevent a review, yet I am willing to place in it provisions that are more definite along this line. But I am not in favor of any provision for review similar to those in the different States, to which reference has been made, because I believe that such a provision would imperil the constitutionality of the law and result in its being declared invalid by the courts. If a provision for a court review is inserted in this bill that is so broad as to be construed as imposing the rate-making power upon the courts, it will be done without my vote.

Mr. President, holding these views, I did not insert in the amendment I offered those words as a limitation upon the court, but as an expression of the jurisdiction they had assumed in such cases. It was after consultation by me with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. FULTON] that the amendment which has been presented by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] was prepared. I said then to those Senators, as I say now, that, in my opinion, the judicial interference of the courts with the orders of the Commission would be the same under the amendment of the Senator from Iowa as under my amendment. The amendment presented by the Senator from Iowa is entirely satisfactory to me, and is not broader than mine. In this bill we give the Commission the power to determine and prescribe a rate which, in its judgment, is just and reasonable, and an order made by it will not be set aside unless it exceeds its authority or invades the constitutional rights of the carrier or shipper. The courts will not review the discretion of the Commission.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, it is very evident that the "grand old Republican party" are united absolutely and without any misgivings or doubts among any of its members in carrying out the programme agreed upon. I therefore withdraw the amendment, as I know it will be voted down. It has already been voted down in different forms about four times.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina withdraws his amendment. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

Mr. ALLISON. Before voting on the amendment, I desire to modify it by inserting the words which I send to the Secretary's desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed modification of the Senator from Iowa will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Before the word "and," the first word in the proposed amendment, insert the following:

And may be brought at any time after such order is promulgated.

Mr. ALLISON. A period should follow the word "promulgated," and the next word—"and"—should begin with a capital letter.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment, to come in immediately after the word "courts."

Mr. ALLISON. I presume I have a right to modify my amendment, Mr. President?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator has a right to modify his amendment. The amendment as modified is now before the Senate. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] offers an amendment to the amendment as modified, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "courts," at the end of the amendment offered by Mr. ALLISON, it is proposed to insert the following:

Whenever an application for a preliminary injunction or interlocutory order is made in any such suit, for the purpose of such motion the order of the Commission and the evidence upon which the same was made shall be taken by the court as prima facie establishing that the rate or charge fixed in such order is just and reasonable.

Mr. FORAKER. I should like to have that amendment reported again.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

The Secretary again read the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. I suggest to the Senator from North Carolina that his amendment, it seems to me, more properly should be placed on page 10 of the printed amendments.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will say to the Senator that I will examine into that later, but I desire to submit some remarks before the vote is taken upon his amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. I withdraw the suggestion.

Mr. SIMMONS. After I have finished my remarks I will withdraw the amendment and later will offer it to the section to which the Senator refers.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, when I was interrupted by the expiration of my fifteen minutes earlier during the day, I stated that I proposed to finish upon some other amendment the discussing which I was then engaged. I will now start where I then left off.

The Hepburn bill, as it was sent to us from the other House, contained the provision which the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] retains in his amendment, so far as fixing the place of venue for such actions as might be brought under the general law and equity practice for the purpose of enjoining, setting aside, or annulling an order of the Commission. No objection has been made by any Senator to this provision of the bill, because both sides of this Chamber are agreed that in certain cases—cases involving questions of constitutional right and cases involving questions of ultra vires—it is beyond the power of Congress to prevent the interference of the courts, and therefore it is admittedly appropriate and necessary that the bill should provide for a venue for the trial of such actions as might, under the principles of law and the Constitution, be instituted against the Commission upon these grounds.

Mr. President, after we have been discussing here for nearly three months the question of whether we should provide in this bill for a broad or a narrow review; after the President had assured the Senate and the country that under no circumstances would he consent to the insertion of any provision which would confer upon the courts unlimited authority to review the actions and the orders of the Commission; after the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber, who have all along stood with the President upon this proposition, had repeatedly asserted upon the floor of the Senate and in private conferences with Senators on this side that they would stand inflexibly and unalterably against a broad court review provision, the Senator from Iowa, speaking for the President and for that part of the Senators on the other side who have heretofore stood with the President in this matter, now proposes to amend the venue provision of the Hepburn bill and confer upon the courts jurisdiction to hear and determine every possible order and requirement of the Commission.

It has been said here, and truthfully said, that language could not frame a court review broader than that provided in the amendment of the Senator from Iowa. Mr. President, when we say to the Senators on the other side who have for three months been standing with us on this question and who have now deserted us, "This provision is as broad as it can be made; jurisdiction more complete could not be conferred upon the courts," we are met with an amazing explanation. What is that explanation? The explanation is this: Though the language of this amendment may be, and is, sufficiently broad to confer upon the courts unlimited jurisdiction over all the orders and the requirements of the Commission, the courts will not, although ample jurisdiction is conferred upon them, have power to review any orders or requirements of the Commission, except orders which violate constitutional rights or which are ultra vires.

In other words, that it makes no difference how broad the language of the court-review provision is, the powers of the court to hear and determine a controversy as to the orders of the Commission is limited to such orders as are unconstitutional or ultra vires.

If that be true, if, notwithstanding the fact that the bill gives the courts the broadest possible jurisdiction to review these orders, the courts can not exercise that power except in cases involving constitutional rights or ultra vires, what in the name of common sense is the difference, so far as any possible provision of this bill is concerned, between a broad and a limited review? What has all this controversy during the last three months been about? Why have the gentlemen during these long months of debate insisted so strenuously that Congress should not write into this bill a broad court review, if, when it write it there, the courts have no greater powers in this regard than they would have under a provision giving the courts only limited powers of review?

If the explanation, if the reason these gentlemen give as a justification for their change of front be sound, Congress has no control whatever over this question of court review; it is a constitutional question; there is no difference between a broad and limited review, and this whole controversy has been a vain and a foolish controversy from the beginning. I say it is amazing that our erstwhile friends on the other side have just made this astonishing discovery.

Mr. President, the people of this country were reasonably satisfied with the Hepburn bill as it came from the House. They knew that it did not give them much; they knew that it did not give them as much as they demanded; they knew that it did not give them as much as they were entitled to demand of their representatives in Congress; but they recognized it as a step in the right direction; they regarded it as the recognition of a principle for which they contended, and they were content to wait until the Senate and the House should be constituted in a way that would enable them to come with increased demands with some hope and assurance of having them recognized.

When this bill came over from the House, instantly assaults began to be made upon it in this body. It was sought to weaken it in its essential remedial provisions, weaken it in the interest of the railroads instead of strengthen it in the interest of the people. They were assaults calculated to emasculate the bill and impair the little it offers in the way of relief from hard and oppressive conditions.

Under the old law the Commission had the right to declare a rate unreasonable and to denounce it. All this bill added to that power was the power to substitute for the denounced rate a rate found by it to be just and reasonable. Now, we are met with a proposition—and I say it is a proposition not in the interest of the people, but in the interest of the railroads—that when the Commission shall substitute a rate for one found unreasonable the matter may be taken, upon an ex parte proceeding, into the courts and the rate suspended until the court has determined what it will do about it.

I believe the people demand and have a right to demand that when the Commission shall fix a rate that rate shall not be suspended except upon final hearing and determination by the court. More than that, they demand that the court shall keep its hands off the rate unless a constitutional right is involved or unless the order fixing it is ultra vires. These are the cardinal contentions of the people in this controversy. Both of these demands of the people have been turned down by the agreement on the other side, and their interests in these respects ignored and trampled under foot.

Mr. President, if this bill shall pass the Senate, as I take it it will, with no power to prevent the courts from suspending a rate until final hearing, with full power invested in the courts to review and to set aside every order that the Commission may make, this legislation will not be what the people want and expect and demand. A victory will have been won by somebody—I will not say who—but that victory will not be a victory for the people, it will be a victory for the railroads.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa. The Chair understood the Senator from North Carolina to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. I withdraw temporarily the amendment offered by me.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi proposes an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "courts," the last word in the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, it is proposed to insert:

> No judge who owns any stock in a corporation engaged in interstate commerce shall be eligible to make a fiat for the issuance of any process or to sit in the trial in any case where such corporation is a party, or directly or indirectly interested, in the result of the trial of the case.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, I favored and voted for the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

Mr. HALE. There is so much noise that it is impossible to hear the Senator. I ask that the amendment be again read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will again be stated by the Secretary.

The Secretary again read the amendment.

Mr. HALE. The amendment offered by the Senator is not, I think, in the exact language of the one that was tabled by the Senate, and therefore I have no doubt, not being identically the same, is in order. But I shall move, when the Senator has presented the case and it has been discussed by him—as I did in the other case—that it be laid on the table.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, I suppose the motion of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] will carry. But I wish to state that the suggestion made by the Senator from Maine a while ago, when the amendment to the amendment that was offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] was before the Senate, that the Senator has respect for the judiciary, is not to be understood as an assertion that no other Senator has respect for the judiciary except the Senator from Maine. The sentiment of respect for the judiciary is a sentiment of which no Senator has a monopoly. I myself have respect for the courts, and a very great respect for their judgment, their learning, their ability, and for their decisions; but I would not like to have a judge sitting in a case between me and my opponent where that judge was a partner in business with my opponent, and especially a partner in the business about which the litigation proceeds. If the judge who sits in the trial of a case in which I may be involved is to be interested in the business of either litigant, I would like to have his interest on my side, and I do not suppose any Senator would be willing to have his case tried before a judge who is a partner of the opposing litigant.

It is no reflection upon the court to say that the judge who sits shall be an impartial judge and shall have no interest in the litigation. It is no reflection upon the judge who sits in the case to say that he is human and that he is impressed with the frailties and weaknesses of human nature. The framers of the Constitution understood that men in very high and exalted positions were nothing more than men, and that they were impressed with the human nature that causes everyone to look out first for his own interest and the interests of those who are near to him. I will read what the framers of the Constitution provided with reference to Senators and Representatives:

> No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States which shall have been created or the emoluments whereof have been increased during such time; and no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office.

This provision of the Constitution recognizes that all men, and it does not make any difference how high they may rise in official station, are imbued with human nature, which looks first to one's own interest. No judge ought to sit in a case where he is interested in a corporation which is a party to the litigation. No judge ought to make a fiat for the issuance of any process in any case where he is interested in the result of the litigation. For that reason I think this amendment ought to be adopted.

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator from Mississippi allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. McLAURIN. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. Is it not true that the amendment is the law now? Could any judge at the present time try a case in which a railroad was involved if he owned stock in it? Could not counsel disqualify him by calling attention to that fact? Would any judge with any self-respect want to try a case involving a railroad when he owned stock in the railroad company? Is not the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi the law at this time?

Mr. McLAURIN. It may be in some measure the law at this time, but I do not know whether it would exactly fit the case. But there can be no objection to providing that such a judge shall not issue a preliminary injunction.

There has been a good deal of discussion on the constitutional question, if there be such a question (and but for the fact that the opposing view is supported by the very able Senators who have supported it I would not think there was any question), whether Congress has the right to limit the power of a court to issue a preliminary injunction. If a court can not be limited in that particular, and if the Congress has no power over that—and I do not believe that is the constitutional construction which is correct—if that be so, and if the courts are to issue preliminary injunctions prohibiting the taking effect of the Commission's order or rate, then certainly the judge who does issue that injunction ought to be perfectly impartial, and there ought to be no objection to putting in this provision, because we are making a separate provision here for the courts to take jurisdiction of these questions, and some question may arise as to whether judges who have been prohibited heretofore from proceeding in cases where they are interested would have the right to grant a preliminary injunction or to make a fiat for the issuance of a preliminary injunction.

I think this amendment ought to be adopted. I do not desire to make any reflection upon the judiciary; I have not made any, and I do not make any, unless it is a reflection to say that judges are just like other people. It does not make any difference whether they are the humblest people in the land or the highest people in the land, all men are impressed alike with their own interests when it comes to deciding a question between themselves and others litigating with them.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not desire to address the Senate, but I wish to ask the Senator from Mississippi a question before he takes his seat. Does he think there is a judge of a United States court to be found anywhere throughout the length and breadth of the land who would sit in judgment in a case where he was personally interested?

Mr. McLAURIN. It is not for me to say whether or not a judge of that kind can be found. But I will ask the Senator, as an answer to that question, another question. Does he think that any Senator or Representative could be influenced in the creation of an office to which he might be appointed?

Mr. FORAKER. No; I do not think so. The Constitution——

Mr. McLAURIN. Then what was the necessity of putting the provision in the Constitution prohibiting a thing of that kind?

Mr. FORAKER. I would have to think so, because it is in the Constitution. But here we are free to legislate. The objection I have to the proposition of the Senator from Mississippi is not based upon the idea that I think a judge interested in a case should sit in judgment, but because I think it is pretty nearly an insult to the judiciary of the country to provide by legislation that they shall not do a thing so inappropriate that according to my observation and experience and belief there is not a judge in the whole United States who would think of doing it.

Mr. McLAURIN. I do not think it is any more of an insult to a judge of the Supreme Court of the United States, even to make laws to apply to him, than it is an insult to the humblest citizen to make laws to apply to him. I do not think, and I never have thought, that there ought to be any difference between the highest and the lowest citizen in the land when you come to making laws for their conduct.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

Mr. McLAURIN. I want fully to answer the question, in addition to what I have answered, by asking the Senator from Ohio another question. I want to say that I do not know whether there is a judge in the United States who would sit in a case in which he was interested, or whether there is a judge in the United States who would issue a fiat for the issuance of an injunction or any other process in a case in which he was interested. But if there is such a judge in the United States I want to have a law that will apply to him. I do not believe that judges are immaculate. I do not believe the judges are above the law any more than I believe any other citizen is.

Mr. FORAKER. The objection I have to the Senator's amendment is that he does assume not only that they are not immaculate, as he expresses it, but he assumes necessarily that there are judges who are violating their sense of propriety to such an extent that they have to be restrained. I think the Senator from Maine well said this morning that it is time here in the United States Senate to stop doing that which is necessarily in itself an offense to a coordinate branch of the Government that has certainly enjoyed the confidence, and deservedly so, of the American people for more than a hundred years of the existence of the American nation.

Mr. McLAURIN. I do not assume any such thing, but I assume that if there is such a judge, he ought not to be permitted to sit. I do not any more assume in this amendment that there are such judges than the law of Congress assumes that Senators and Representatives will be guilty of a felony if they go before the Department and practice there for pay. There is no more assumption that a judge will sit upon the bench in a case in which he is interested, because there is a provision made by law that he shall not do it, than there is an assumption that a Senator or Representative in Congress will practice before the Department for pay when there is a law that will send him to the penitentiary if he does it.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the proposition is monstrous that a Federal judge of a great court—and all United States courts are great courts—would sit in a case and pass upon it when he is a partner with one of the sides in controversy and has an interest in the profits of that side. Any judge who would so forget the duties of his great office and would have any share in such a scandal and such a corruption is to be reached by other processes. He is subject under the Constitution to impeachment, and will be turned from his high place on impeachment, as judges have been heretofore for less grievous offenses. It is not comporting with the dignity of legislation here that the Senate shall pass any proposition as an amendment to this bill which assumes or admits for a moment that the judge of a United States court would be found in such a position. I do not think I need to say more. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Maine to lay on the table the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. McLAURIN. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I think the spirit of the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi is correct. But the law is full of it now, and the judges always apply it when any suggestion is made, even a slight intimation that they may possibly have an interest in the suit by relationship or by personal interest, etc. But it seems to me that the amendment——

Mr. HALE. I ask the Chair——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine has moved to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask the Senator from Maine to withdraw that motion for a moment.

Mr. HALE. Certainly, if the Senator from Alabama desires to say anything.

Mr. MORGAN. It seems to me there is an objection to the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi to this effect, that it produces a disqualification in the judge upon the existence merely of the fact of his interest, more or less direct or remote, in some corporation or some company that is concerned in the litigation. Facts of that sort may exist, which, if they were brought to the attention of the judge, would at once require a judgment on his part that he ought to retire, that he ought to recuse himself from the judgment in the case. But suppose a case passes into judgment, and it is afterwards shown, in a collateral attack upon that judgment, that these disabilities did actually exist. There your judgment becomes void, because of proof of the fact that the disabilities did exist. That is dangerous legislation. If a judge by misadventure or even misbehavior should render a judgment in court, and it should afterwards become ascertained that he was disqualified, the judgment does not thereby become void. No collateral attack can be made upon it.

In my own State I remember a case where a man was condemned for punishment for a felony of very high grade, and the question of the judge's qualification to sit on the bench was then pending in some of the courts, and was afterwards determined against him. The question was raised upon a motion of some kind—I forget the precise proceeding—that the judgment was void because the judge had been declared as being disqualified at the time he pronounced it. The supreme court of Alabama held that the judgment was valid notwithstanding his alleged disabilities and notwithstanding they had been so determined against him.

It is for the sake of preserving the validity of judgments that I make this question. I do not want to make a law by positive enactment of the statute in such shape that any party can come in after judgment has been rendered and attack it collaterally by proving that in fact certain disqualifications existed because of this remote or direct interest of the judge in different corporations. I think it is dangerous legislation.

Mr. McLAURIN. Will the Senator from Maine withhold his motion long enough for me to read a section of the Revised Statutes and ask him a question?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. McLAURIN. Section 5499 of the Revised Statutes reads:

SEC. 5499. Every judge of the United States, who in anywise accepts or receives any sum of money, or other bribe, present, or reward, or any promise, contract, obligation, gift, or security for the payment of money, or the delivery or conveyance of anything of value, with the intent to be influenced thereby in any opinion, judgment, or decree in any suit, controversy, matter, or cause depending before him, shall be fined and imprisoned at the discretion of the court, and shall be forever disqualified to hold any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States.

I will ask the Senator—and the same question would apply to the Senator from Ohio—if he supposes that the Congress which enacted that law was making a reflection, a direct charge, upon the judges and judiciary of the country?

Mr. FORAKER. No; I do not. That was statutory provision against the commission of a crime.

Mr. BAILEY. It is more likely that a judge would commit an impropriety than that he would commit a crime.

Mr. FORAKER. I intended to call attention a moment ago to the fact that it is the law, as well established as though written in so many words, that no judge shall sit in judgment in his own case.

Mr. McLAURIN. If the Senator will allow me, that is a very different proposition from what the Senator urged as an objection to this amendment.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I shall have to insist upon my motion.

Mr. McLAURIN. The objection was that it was a reflection upon the judges even to offer the amendment.

Mr. FORAKER. I meant a reflection under all the circumstances. It is already provided in the statute, section 615, to which my attention has just been called——

Mr. McLAURIN. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. FORAKER. I ask to have that section read before the motion to lay on the table is insisted upon.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I seem to be powerless.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine insist upon his motion?

Mr. HALE. I do.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine moves to lay on the table the proposed amendment of the Senator from Mississippi to the amendment. Upon that question the yeas and nays are demanded. Is there a second?

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary called the roll.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. WARREN], and to announce his pair with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY]. I desire that this announcement shall stand for the remainder of the day.

The result was announced—yeas 49, nays 23, as follows:

YEAS—49.

Aldrich	Crane	Hansbrough	Perkins
Alger	Cullom	Hemenway	Piles
Allee	Dick	Hopkins	Platt
Allison	Dillingham	Kean	Scott

So Mr. MCLAURIN's amendment to the amendment was laid on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

Mr. DANIEL. I move an amendment. I move to insert, after line 13, page 9, of the amendment, the following words:

In any such suit the bill or other complaint shall be accompanied by a full copy of the record made in the hearing before the Interstate Commerce Commission and of all the testimony in the case.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. At what point does the Senator from Virginia propose his amendment?

Mr. DANIEL. Immediately after line 13, page 9, at the bottom of the provision as to the venue of suits.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Page 9 of what print?

Mr. DANIEL. Page 9 of the amendments "intended to be proposed by Mr. CULLOM for Mr. ALLISON and by Mr. RAYNER" May 8.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa will be read.

The SECRETARY. After the word "courts," at the end of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa, insert:

In any such suit the bill or other complaint shall be accompanied by a full copy of the record made in the hearing before the Interstate Commerce Commission and of all the testimony in the case.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, I have heretofore set forth the considerations which appear to my mind to commend such an amendment to the bill. I shall not repeat them except with great brevity.

Attention has been called to the fact frequently in this debate that in the great majority of the cases which have been brought in equity to set aside the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission a new case has been made a different case from that which was before the Commission when they determined it. Attention has been also called to the fact that in thirty-six of forty-two cases in which the court made different decisions from those of the Interstate Commerce Commission it was upon the new case made and not upon the case which had been heard by the Commission. The production of the record with the bill of complaint in the suit in equity which is contemplated will permit the court to see in taking up the case exactly upon what testimony the decision had been made.

In the bill which was prepared by the Interstate Commerce Commission and sent to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, or which, at least, that committee had before it, a process was recommended and put down by the committee after the fashion of the old English bill of certiorari, and in one of its sections it was provided that the respondent in such suit should present the record. Now, instead of leaving it for the respondent to present the record, it is proposed here that the carrier complaining of the decision, seeking in equity to bring about a different one, shall lay before the court the full record and all the testimony upon which the Interstate Commerce Commission gave its order or decree.

It is economical to do this, Mr. President, and avoids repeating the same thing under process of law. If depositions have already been taken, they will be produced without the necessity of taking them again. If exhibits from records and statistics had been laid before the Interstate Commerce Commission, the court will receive them without the expense, trouble, and delay of going over the same road a second time. One great public and private interest will be subserved in this provision, the great object which is sought to be obtained by various of the provisions of the Allison amendment—the prevention of delay—will be attained.

We are not, Mr. President, without precedents, and in Federal jurisprudence for this action I have already called attention to the fact that in the settlement of titles of thousands—I may say of millions—of acres of public land in California, as long ago as 1851, Congress provided just such a procedure. I have laid before the Senate in previous remarks a copy of the statute in which Congress required that a transcript of the record should be taken to the appellate court with the record of what the Commissioners had done.

There are some very commendable provisions in this Allison amendment, especially that which relates to the interlocutory order or decree suspending or restraining the enforcement of an order of the Commission. It is provided in a part of one of the Allison amendments that no such order or decree shall be made without five days' notice to the Commission. This is a new rule of practice and one which is evidently directed to prevent delay. It is also provided that the case shall be heard, if I mistake not, before the interlocutory injunction is granted.

If this be the case and if this be the order of procedure which Congress is so wisely amending to suit this case, it will be much aided and subserved by taking up the record, so that the whole case anterior to that time, at least, will be seen in the very opening of the procedure without the necessary delays which would otherwise arise in taking again the same depositions, in getting again the same exhibits, and in going again over the same long and prolix road which had been pursued.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator from Virginia yield to me for a moment?

Mr. DANIEL. Yes, sir; I will yield the floor to the Senator from Iowa. I am done with what I have to say.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not wish to occupy time except to suggest to the Senator that these are suits which are to be commenced by the carrier——

Mr. DANIEL. I understand that.

Mr. ALLISON. And against the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. DANIEL. That is right.

Mr. ALLISON. It seems to me it would be the regular course for the Interstate Commerce Commission to file with their answer all the proceedings had before the Commission and that that will be done without a statutory provision. It is perfectly sure that the entire record must go into the court, and I suggest to the Senator that the Interstate Commerce Commission will be quite sure that it does go into the court.

Mr. RAYNER. I should like to suggest, if the Senator will permit me, that there is no power at all to bring this record into court. Under the present law the record is prima facie evidence. In this proposed law it is only prima facie evidence as to a money demand. If the case is tried de novo, even if you only try it under a constitutional question, there is no way to get the record into court that I know of. I may be mistaken, but I submit it to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. ALLISON. It is perfectly sure that the record ought to be in court; I quite agree to that. But it seems to me the natural way to bring the record in will be by the Interstate Commerce Commission when they file their answer to the complaint in the court or in their answer to an application for an injunction by way of showing that the injunction should not be granted.

I agree with the Senator from Virginia that there ought to be a full record made in these cases. The bill as amended does not specifically provide for that as does the present law, because under section 14, if I remember aright, of the existing law there must be a full record kept, including the testimony.

Mr. RAYNER. That is right.

Mr. ALLISON. But section 14 has been modified in the bill so as to require only the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission. So if the Senator from Virginia will withhold his amendment until later we will have time to examine that question. I think that in some way the record should be brought before the court, but the carrier will not be in possession of it, and therefore he may be embarrassed in securing possession. I am in favor of having a complete record in the court, whether on an application for injunction or upon the final trial of the case before the court: and I think it ought to be done.

Mr. RAYNER. This is a question of some importance. What power would the court have to examine the testimony? If a case goes into court, it is a new case that is tried; it is not a review; it is not an appeal; it is entirely an original case.

Mr. ALLISON. It is an original case.

Mr. RAYNER. Now, what power would the court have unless you give it the power. And that power I consider to be very questionable unless you give it the power. What right would a court have to consider the testimony taken before the Commission in hearing an adjudication of the case before the court?

Mr. ALLISON. That is a question I would defer to the Senator from Maryland and the Senator from Virginia to answer rather than undertake to answer it myself; but if we are to have this record carried into the case in the court compulsorily, then we should also provide in some place in section 14 that the record shall be taken and presented to the court, and when presented shall become prima facie evidence. I agree to that. So if the Senator would allow this to go over, that proper amendment or amendments may be made covering that case, I should be very glad.

Mr. DANIEL. May I inquire how many minutes more I have?

Mr. ALLISON. I beg pardon; I thought the Senator had finished. I have nothing further to say.

Mr. DANIEL. I was very glad to yield any time the Senator from Iowa wished to occupy.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia has four minutes more.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, I have consulted with the Interstate Commerce Commissioners on this subject. I have studied this matter with all the aid of books that I could find upon the subject. The Interstate Commerce Commissioners inform me that it is their custom to furnish the record, and that it will be a very convenient matter to do so; that there is no impediment to its being readily and easily done. I am very glad to find that this idea has struck so favorably such an experienced and practical mind as that of the Senator from Iowa.

There is one other idea alone which I will refer to now. The Supreme Court in several cases, which I could cite here if I chose to take the time of the Senate to read them, has commented upon the fact that carrier companies frequently fail to put in their testimony before the Interstate Commerce Commission, and then show their full hand in a case de novo before the court; and it has arisen from the fact that the courts have taken jurisdiction of this matter through the old channels of equity jurisdiction and according to the usages in the growth of equity as to a different class of cases, whereas herein we have a very peculiar class of cases, partly administrative and partly judicial, which never can be fully and appropriately reached without that assistance from new legislation which this Government has been accustomed to accord whenever a new class of cases arose. In this particular I am following what is already the precedent of Congress and what has been passed on by the Supreme Court of the United States; and I cited at least three cases in previous remarks in which they had commented upon a like procedure.

I will withdraw my amendment, as suggested by the Senator from Iowa, so that this matter may receive the fuller attention of Senators upon the other side, hoping that it may be thereby matured.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say to the Senator from Virginia that under the existing law the Commission is bound to make a finding of fact, and the testimony and their finding of fact and their decision go to the court. So I think this is a necessary provision. I think it should be a little broader than is now suggested by the Senator, and if he will withdraw the amendment I will be glad to call his attention to what I think ought to be done in the matter.

Mr. DANIEL. Just this additional thought, Mr. President. It is important that in the first blush of the case, especially when suspending orders are in view, the court that takes up that case should have an opportunity to see its full history without waiting for a response.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia withdraw his amendment to the amendment?

Mr. DANIEL. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment is withdrawn. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, at the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa, I withdraw the amendment which I had offered a while ago, stating that I would examine his suggestion that there was a more appropriate place in the bill for that amendment. From the result of that examination I think the appropriate place for the amendment is the section now under consideration. I wish to renew that amendment with some qualifications, and I will ask the Secretary to change it as I may suggest. Strike out the words "and the evidence upon which the same was made" and strike out the words "taken as prima facie establishing" and insert:

Accorded by the court or judge the same degree of verity as that accorded in a court of equity to the finding of a special master as establishing.

Mr. CULLOM. Does the Senator from North Carolina withdraw his amendment until the Allison amendment is disposed of?

Mr. SIMMONS. I offer a modified amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from North Carolina will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Whenever an application for a preliminary injunction or interlocutory order is made in any such suit, for the purpose of such motion the order of the Commission shall be accorded by the court or judge the same degree of verity as that accorded in a court of equity to the finding of a special master, as establishing that the rate or charge fixed in said order is just and reasonable.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. SIMMONS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SIMMONS. I now desire to offer the amendment as originally offered by myself.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina proposes an amendment, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. After the word "courts," the last word in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa, insert:

Whenever an application for a preliminary injunction or interlocutory order is made in any such suit for the purpose of such motion, the order of the Commission and the evidence upon which the same was made shall be taken by the court as prima facie establishing that the rate or charge fixed in said order is just and reasonable.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr SIMMONS] to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON]. [Putting the question.] The noes have it, and the amendment to the amendment is rejected.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BACON. I offer an amendment, to come in immediately after the amendment which has just been adopted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the amendment which has just been adopted it is proposed to insert:

In case any application, motion, or prayer for such interlocutory or preliminary order or decree shall be made by any party to such complaint, other than the carrier or carriers to be affected by the rate or charge, practice, or regulation, in question prescribed by the Commission, then and in that case said carrier or carriers shall, before the hearing of said application, motion, or prayer, by appropriate order and process, be made a party or parties to the said complaint in equity to abide such orders and decrees as may be made by the court pending said cause and the final judgment and decree in the same. Upon the granting of any interlocutory or preliminary order or decree restraining, setting aside, suspending, or modifying any rate or charge, regulation, or practice prescribed by the Commission, before said interlocutory or preliminary order or decree shall be operative or of any effect, the carrier, person, or corporation seeking such order or decree shall deposit in the registry of the court and subject to the order thereof, as hereinafter specified, such an amount as may be required in the discretion of the court, either in lawful money of the United States or in lawful bonds of the United States at the par value thereof. It shall, in addition thereto, be the duty of the said carrier or carriers to be affected by the rate or charge, practice, or regulation in question to pay into the registry of the court, subject to its order, the sums of money as herein specified, and to effectuate the same, at the time of granting such preliminary or interlocutory order or decree, the court shall by appropriate order require the said carrier or carriers affected by the rate or charge, practice, or regulation in question prescribed by the Commission to pay into the registry of the court and subject to its order, on or before the 10th day of each month pending the said interlocutory or preliminary order or decree, in lawful money of the United States, all money received by such carrier or carriers during the calendar month next preceding said date and subsequent to the date of filing said complaint from the collection made for all shipments upon the rates and charges in question in excess of the rates and charges as fixed and determined by the order of said Commission. On the said 10th day of each month there shall be filed in court by said carrier or carriers, through their duly authorized officer or officers, a statement under oath of the shipments on account of which said collections have been made, setting forth in detail the character and amounts of said shipments, the point of each shipment and of its destination, the names of the consignors and consignees, the amount collected from each for said shipment, and separately the excess collected as aforesaid, and the names of the persons from whom collected. The said court at the time of granting said temporary or interlocutory order or decree, and in its discretion thereafter from time to time, shall require the said carrier or carriers to give such bond and security as may be deemed sufficient to insure the filing of said reports and the payment of said amounts; and in addition thereto shall, by the orders and processes of a court of equity, enforce summarily the prompt payment of said amounts into the registry of the court, from which orders of the court there shall be no appeal. Any refusal or failure to comply with said orders and to pay into the court the said sum of money as herein provided shall constitute a contempt of the court. For the purpose of said orders the court shall be deemed to be always in session. From said orders or decrees for the payment into court of the said amounts no appeal shall lie.

If upon the final decree in said cause the rate or charge prescribed by the Commission shall be adjudged to be valid, the court shall, by proper orders and decrees out of the said deposit or the proceeds of the sale thereof and the additional payments made into the court by the said carrier or carriers, caused to be paid to each of the persons from whom collections have been made the several amounts paid by each of them to said carrier or carriers in excess of the said rate or charges prescribed by the Commission, with interest thereon from the date of each payment at the rate of 6 per cent per annum.

If upon the final decree in said cause the rate or charge prescribed by the Commission shall be adjudged to be invalid and the enforcement of the same shall be enjoined, the court shall, by proper orders and decrees, direct to be paid over to the said carrier or carriers the sum of money thus theretofore deposited and paid into the registry of the court, less such amounts for costs as the court, in its discretion, under the circumstances of any case, may in justice and equity deem to be reasonably chargeable to said carrier or carriers.

Pending said cause, it shall be within the power of the court, by appropriate proceedings, either in open court or through a master in chancery or commissioner, to examine into the correctness of the reports herein required to be made under oath by the said carrier or carriers, and to this end to examine, under oath, their officials and employees, and to require, by order, the production of the books and papers of said carrier or carriers.

If, upon the said examination, it shall be adjudged that the said carrier or carriers have not made complete returns of all of said shipments and the amounts collected thereon, as herein specified, the court shall, by order, require the said carrier or carriers to pay into the registry of the court, in lawful money of the United States, the amount received on account of said shipments in excess of the amounts theretofore reported to the court.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I only desire to say a few words. I shall not take the time of the Senate to discuss this amendment at length. It has been printed and on the desks of Senators for weeks and, of course, they are familiar with it. I think it very important, and I shall be glad if those who have a majority in this body will adopt it and engraft it upon the bill.

There are two or three things which the amendment will certainly accomplish. If this amendment be adopted, there will never be a frivolous case brought against the Interstate Commerce Commission. No company will ever attempt to seek to set aside the orders of the Commission unless there is a very serious grievance, in their opinion, from which they seek to be freed.

Another very important feature in regard to this amendment, or rather one which will result or flow from it, would be that there would be certainly no delay on the part of railroad companies in the prosecution of a case. They would, on the contrary, have every reason to be stimulated to the highest diligence and the utmost speed.

Of course I recognize the fact that it is not a complete remedy, for the reason that the consumer, who would largely suffer from these increased rates, possibly, and not only possibly, but in fact, would not receive his part of the compensation which would be paid into the court; but it goes a long way in that direction. Aside from the fact of the protection of the public, the two things I have mentioned are of the utmost importance, and there is nothing in the bill as it now stands which would accomplish either of those purposes, to wit, a deterrent against frivolous suits and a stimulus to the highest expedition in the prosecution of a suit when brought.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. ALLISON. I now offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 17, line 18, after the word "suits," it is proposed to insert the words "including the hearing on an application for a preliminary injunction."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I offer another amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 18, line 6, after the word "causes," it is proposed to strike out the period and insert a colon and the following language:

Provided, That no injunction, interlocutory order, or decree suspending or restraining the enforcement of an order of the Commission shall be granted except on hearing, after not less than five days' notice to the Commission. An appeal may be taken from any interlocutory order or decree granting or continuing an injunction in any suit, but shall lie only to the Supreme Court of the United States: Provided further, That the appeal must be taken within thirty days from the entry of such order or decree, and it shall take precedence in the appellate court over all other causes, except causes of like character and criminal causes.

Mr. OVERMAN. I offer an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina will be stated.

Mr. OVERMAN. In the amendment of the Senator from Iowa are the following words:

Provided, That no injunction, interlocutory order or decree, suspending or restraining the enforcement of an order of the Commission shall be granted except on hearing, after not less than five days' notice to the Commission.

I wish to amend the amendment by substituting for those words the following:

Provided, however, That no rate or charge, regulation, or practice prescribed by the Commission shall be set aside or suspended by any preliminary or interlocutory decree or order of court or judge without first giving reasonable notice to the Commission of the time and place of moving to set aside the same, nor until bill of complaint and answer or demurred filed and hearing thereon had.

Mr. President, we have heard very much said in the newspapers and upon this floor about the Overman amendment. It has been suggested by a Senator near me that it is the Overman amendment with the Overman left out. The amendment just introduced by the Senator from Iowa is practically my amendment, except it has eviscerated the very meat contained in the amendment introduced by myself. It leaves out the words "answer and bill of complaint." I state here, Mr. President, that if this amendment is adopted it will be no more than the law as it now stands. Section 718 of the Revised Statutes provides as follows:

SEC. 718. Whenever notice is given of a motion for an injunction out of a circuit or district court, the court or judge thereof may, if there appears to be danger of irreparable injury from delay, grant an order restraining the act sought to be enjoined until the decision upon the motion; and such order may be granted with or without security, in the discretion of the court or judge.

This amendment has been under discussion in the Senate for more than sixty days, and I have yet to hear one Senator say that it was not a proper amendment to this bill and that it was not constitutional. Now, sir, under the amendment as introduced by the Senator from Iowa, if adopted, any man can go, as he can now, before the court and simply upon an ex parte petition get out an injunction. Upon a hearing? A hearing of what? Upon a petition? My amendment provides that there shall be a petition filed, that there shall be an answer filed, that there shall be a hearing, that there shall be an issue joined, and the whole matter be brought before the court upon its merits. The provision of the amendment of the Senator from Iowa requires that three judges shall hear it—this is a wise provision—and that there may be an appeal directly to the Supreme Court. Under the amendment of the Senator from Iowa any railroad lawyer can present his petition and allege that property of the railroad is being taken without just compensation. It goes before the judges. There is no answer filed. Then it is heard upon ex parte statements, and it goes immediately to the Supreme Court upon these ex parte statements. The issue is not joined; it is not heard upon its merits. This amendment, which will prevent these ex parte injunctions, has been indorsed by the President himself in a telegram sent throughout the country. I ask that this amendment be adopted in lieu of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina propose to strike out all of the amendment?

Mr. OVERMAN. No, sir; I said in lieu of certain words which I stated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I would be a little less than human, or perhaps it would be better to say that I would be a little more than human, if I did not express my great satisfaction at seeing the Republican party at last accept my contention that Congress can limit the injunctive process of inferior Federal courts. I know that the Senate is impatient for a vote, and yet I venture to believe that they will indulge me while I recall for a moment the argument which was made against my proposition, and then test that argument by this proposition.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] both admitted that Congress could control the jurisdiction of the court, though that proposition itself was stubbornly disputed in the beginning. But those Senators said—they said it in the open Senate, and other Senators said it out of the Senate—that the moment Congress gave jurisdiction to a court over a case the judicial power of the Constitution attached, and Congress could not limit or control that judicial power. Does this amendment of the Senator from Iowa conform to that argument? Let us see.

No injunction shall be granted except upon a hearing after not less than five days' notice.

Now, mark you, Mr. President, if it is depriving a carrier of its property without due process of the law, or if it is taking its property without just compensation to deny a preliminary injunction, then Congress can no more deny it for five days than it could for five years. The Constitution does not say that a person shall not be deprived of his property without due process of law for an unreasonable time; the Constitution does not say that a man shall not be deprived of his property without just compensation for a month or a year, but that he shall not be deprived of it at all without due process or without just compensation. It is as much a violation of the Constitution to take a man's property for an hour as it is for a year, and it is as much a violation to take it for a year as it is to take it for a century.

I have contended all the time, and I contend now, and I am supported in that contention by this amendment, that all the constitutional requirement of due process demands is that the carrier shall have one fair trial for its property rights. I have contended that we can take its property and pay it a just compensation as ascertained by the Commission and that we can use it until the compensation has been established to be less than just upon a final trial. Under this amendment the carrier can not set aside the Commission's rate by alleging that it is less than a just compensation or less than a just and reasonable rate. Shippers can go on and take the carriers' services for five days, it is certain, because the court can not enjoin it until after notice of five days has been given, and then they must wait for a hearing. Senators, how long will it take the Commission and the carrier to prepare for that hearing? One week or one month? The principle is the same, and so it is this amendment asserts the power——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Judge Brewer said in the Tompkins case that it could not be done with three weeks of diligent labor.

Mr. BAILEY. I thank the Senator for his suggestion. The Senator from Iowa agrees with me that the court can be prevented from issuing preliminary injunction. The only difference between the Senator from Iowa and myself is how long will we prevent it. As the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] well says, if we can prevent it for five days, we can prevent it for five weeks; and if we can prevent it for five weeks, we can prevent it for five months, or five years; and so it is, that, after all, the difference between the Senator and myself is one of policy and not of principle. I have had some trouble in satisfying myself as a matter of justice that the Commission's rate ought always to be kept in effect, though I have never had any trouble as a matter of law, and I now welcome to my support the senior Senator from Iowa and his distinguished colleagues.

The complaint of the junior Senator from Iowa against those constitutional lawyers who are always saying that things are unconstitutional I leave him to settle with his political friends on his own side. I have not been saying that this bill or any of its provisions are unconstitutional. I have been offering perfectly constitutional propositions, and the lawyers about whom he complains are the ones who have been inveighing against my propositions as unconstitutional.

But, Mr. President, I want to remind the Senator from Iowa that one of the most important enactments of Congress in recent years was held unconstitutional, and I remember advising the friends of the Wilson bill to take out of it that provision which laid an income tax upon the interest received from county, State, and municipal bonds, and they answered my suggestions by saying that I was trying to exploit my doctrine of State's rights. But yet when the Supreme Court come to review that question it unanimously held that feature of the Wilson bill unconstitutional. I make no apology for the constitutional lawyers; they need none. They are generally attacked by the men who can not understand their arguments. Some men attack them in a jocular way, as the junior Senator from Iowa did. He was not seriously complaining of them, I assume. If we did not have them here, about half the laws we pass would go into the waste basket of the Supreme Court, because that great tribunal can not amend them for us, and unless we send them there perfected they hold them void. I shall never complain of any Senator in this body or elsewhere who strives with persistence to make the legislation of Congress conform to the Constitution of this country. The only constitutional lawyer against whom I complain is the one who says that my proposition is unconstitutional and then proposes one just like it for himself. Against all such I level my criticism.

Mr. President, I believe no Senator in this body will vote against this proposition, and yet I have vanity, if you call it that, enough to want to see them all recorded on it. They have all been recorded in the same way and all in the right way, as I recall it, only on the pipe-line amendment. I will not detain the Senate by further discussion, but I demand the yeas and nays on this amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

Mr. TELLER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CULBERSON. I rise merely to inquire whether the proposition of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] is pending?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It was disagreed to.

Mr. CULBERSON. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON]; on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. CULBERSON. Let that amendment be reported again, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again state the amendment of the Senator from Iowa at the request of the Senator from Texas.

The SECRETARY. On page 18 of the bill, line 6, after the word "causes," it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That no injunction, interlocutory order, or decree suspending or restraining the enforcement of an order of the Commission shall be granted except on hearing after not less than five days' notice to the Commission. An appeal may be taken from any interlocutory order or decree granting or continuing an injunction in any suit, but shall lie only to the Supreme Court of the United States: Provided further, That the appeal must be taken within thirty days from the entry of such order or decree, and it shall take precedence in the appellate court over all other causes, except causes of like character and criminal causes.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SPOONER (when his name was called). My pair with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK] has been transferred to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], and I will vote.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from Wisconsin can vote. I am going to vote "yea."

Mr. SPOONER. I vote "yea."

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 73, nays 3, as follows:

YEAS—73.

Aldrich	Crane	Hale	Overman
Alee	Culberson	Hansbrough	Perkins
Allison	Cullom	Hemenway	Piles
Ankeny	Daniel	Hopkins	Platt
Bacon	Dick	Kean	Rayner

Clarke, Ark.	Morgan	Pettus

NOT VOTING—13.

Alger	Gorman	Money	Warren
Burton	Heyburn	Patterson
Carmack	McEnery	Penrose
Depew	Mallory	Proctor

So Mr. ALLISON's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the next amendment may be read. It is really a formal amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 19, line 22, after the word "order," strike out the remainder of the section in the following words:

Whenever an order of the Commission made in pursuance of section 15 as amended, other than an order for the payment of money, shall have been complied with for the period of three years such order shall not thereafter be in force as against the carrier so complying therewith.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I was unfortunately out of the Chamber and did not have the felicity of hearing the statement which was read in the Senate by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. When I returned to the Chamber I was told about the statement, and there were repeated to me some of the statements that were contained in it. One of the statements attributed to Mr. Chandler in regard to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], in regard to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], and in regard to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] struck me as so extraordinary, and seemed to me on its face so unlikely to be correct and as so unjust to the three Senators involved that I took it upon myself to go to the office of the stenographers and get the sentence accurately copied out. The sentence to which I refer from the stenographer's notes is this:

Mr. Chandler said the President had stated that he had come to a complete disagreement with the Senatorial lawyers, who were trying to injure or defeat the bill by ingenious constitutional arguments, naming Senator KNOX, in addition to Senators SPOONER and FORAKER.

I then took the liberty of calling up the White House by telephone; it was the most rapid way of reaching the President, and I took down the statement which he made to me over the telephone, and which I will now read to the Senate, because I think it is important that it should go to the country with the allegation which I have just read.

I read to the President over the telephone the sentence which I have just read to the Senate, and he said in reply that the statement which I had read to him, attributed to him by Mr. Chandler, was a deliberate and unqualified falsehood; that Senator FORAKER's name was never mentioned at all in conversation; that Senator SPOONER's name was only mentioned by him to express a cordial approval of Senator SPOONER's amendment. "As to Senator KNOX, I said that I did not agree with a portion of his proposed amendment, but that I thought he had made out a very strong argument for asserting affirmatively the jurisdiction or authority of the court."

I think, Mr. President, that it is a mere act of justice to allow this statement to go out with that which was read and attributed to the late Senator from New Hampshire, Mr. William E. Chandler.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Massachusetts be good enough to tell the Senate whether the President admits that he sent ex-Senator Chandler to see the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. LODGE. I did not cross-question him in regard to the statement made by the Senator from South Carolina, for I had not heard the statement myself, and the President, of course, has not heard or read one word of it. I imagine tomorrow, when he has the opportunity of reading the statement in full, he will make reply to it in such manner as to satisfy the utmost curiosity of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BAILEY. It was not a matter of curiosity, Mr. President. If it were true that the President of the United States had not requested, through the ex-Senator from New Hampshire, his conferences with the Senator from South Carolina, that also ought to go into the RECORD, because I take it that the Senator from South Carolina is just as willing as the Senator from Massachusetts for the President of the United States to have the full benefit of the truth.

But I think it is also important for those of us on this side, who had no communication with the President and who had no conversation with Mr. Chandler, to know whether an ex-member of this body has improperly assumed an authority to speak for the President.

Mr. LODGE. It must be perfectly obvious to the Senator from Texas from what I have read that the President admits fully, that he does not seek in any way to deny, that he had a conversation with Senator Chandler.

Mr. BAILEY. On the subject?

Mr. LODGE. On the subject, as he has had with dozens and scores of other men, with Senators of both parties in this Chamber. More than that, of course, can not be said, as the whole statement is not before the President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move to strike out the word "regularly," where it appears on page 16, line 19, and to insert in lieu thereof the word "lawfully."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from North Dakota will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 16, line 19, strike out the word "regularly" and insert "lawfully;" so that it will read:

If, upon such hearing as the court may determine to be necessary, it appears that the order was lawfully made and duly served, and that the carrier is in disobedience of the same, the court shall enforce obedience.

Mr. McCUMBER. Is there any objection to the amendment?

Mr. ALLISON and Mr. FRYE. No.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULBERSON. On page 13 of the printed bill, of date February 26, line 18, I move to amend by striking out the word "two" and inserting the word "three."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. On page 13, line 18, before the word "years," it is proposed to strike out the word "two" and insert "three;" so as to read:

All complaints for the recovery of damages shall be filed with the Commission within three years from the time the cause of action accrues, and not after.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, just a word in explanation. This paragraph is a mere statute of limitations, as I take it, and yesterday I received a telegram from the attorney of the Cattlemen's Association, which reads as follows, after the date and direction:

Cattlemen's claims for reparation have been accruing; three years' limitation clause of Hepburn bill possibly bars prior to two years; insert amendment allowing one year to file accrued claims before Commission.

S. H. COWAN.

It seems to me that that statement is sufficient reason for the Senate to adopt this mere verbal amendment extending the time one year in which accrued claims may be presented.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I should like to hear the amendment again.

The Secretary again stated the amendment.

Mr. DOLLIVER. That section refers to claims for damages on account of overcharges. I think we ought to be careful not to get it in such shape that a claimant may allow his claims to accumulate for a long time before he even complains about them, and then by these actions recover a large accumulation of damages. I think the matter could be better got at by leaving the limitation two years and adding "in case of claims already accrued, an additional year." It certainly would not be a good thing to allow a man to wait three years before even complaining about an overcharge, and then be entitled to recover for the entire three years.

Mr. CULBERSON. I think the suggestion of the Senator simply accomplishes the matter in another way. I have no objection to it. I move, therefore, at the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa, to add, after the word "after," in line 22, page 13, the words:

Provided, That accrued claims may be presented within one year.

That means one year after the passage of this act.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The other amendment, the Chair presumes, is withdrawn.

Mr. CULBERSON. It is.

Mr. McCUMBER. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to three words in this bill on page 10, line 19, where the Commission is to "determine and prescribe" what will, in its judgment, be the just and reasonable rate or charges. I understand there has been a practical agreement not to interfere with those words, and I am not going to move to strike them out, but I want to say now that I consider that by leaving those words in it you are crowding very close to the unconstitutional limit. It is extremely questionable in my mind whether with those words left in the bill it does not substitute the judgment of the Commission for the judgment of Congress as to what shall be a just and reasonable rate.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. I want to say, Mr. President, that I agree entirely with the Senator who has just spoken. In my judgment the retention of these words may be found to work a most profound mischief to the whole legislation. I do not believe it is worth while to run that risk by insisting upon the insertion of these words; but I shall equally with the Senator make no further opposition except to enter my protest and my note of warning, little as it may be worth, as to what may result from retaining these words in the measure.

Mr. BAILEY. May I ask the Senator——

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, there is no amendment pending, and discussion is entirely out of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair agrees with the Senator from Maine. There is no pending amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. DANIEL. I have an amendment to offer. Will the Senator from North Carolina allow me to offer an amendment agreed to by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] and gentlemen on the other side?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia proposes an amendment.

Mr. DANIEL. I now reoffer the amendment which I withdrew at the request of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], after adding, to his satisfaction and to that of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. LONG], who represents him, a few words. I will now read the whole amendment as I offer it with the addition:

In any such suit the bill or other complaint shall be accompanied by a full copy of the record made on the hearing of the case before the Interstate Commerce Commission and of all the testimony therein, which shall be certified and furnished by the Commission to the complainant on demand.

The only addition is to require that the Commission shall furnish a certified copy to the complainant on demand.

Mr. FRYE. Let it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will inquire where the amendment is to come in?

Mr. DANIEL. After line 13, on page 9.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In what print?

Mr. DANIEL. At the end of the amendment as to court review submitted by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

The SECRETARY. After the word "courts," in the amendment agreed to, which was offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], insert:

In any such suit the bill or other complaint shall be accompanied by a full copy of the record made on the hearing of the case before the Interstate Commerce Commission and of all the testimony therein, which shall be certified and furnished by the Commission to the complainant on demand.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. When the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] rose a few minutes ago I was on my feet seeking the recognition of the Chair for the purpose of offering an amendment.

Mr. LODGE. I rise to a question of order. What amendment is now pending?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is no amendment now pending.

Mr. FORAKER. I ask that the amendment just adopted may be read.

Mr. SIMMONS. My purpose is to offer an amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment just adopted, if the Senator from North Carolina will suspend for a moment.

The SECRETARY. After the word "courts," in the amendment agreed to, insert the following:

In any such suit the bill or other complaint shall be accompanied by a full copy of the record made on the hearing of the case before the Interstate Commerce Commission and of all the testimony therein, which shall be certified and furnished by the Commission to the complainant on demand.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I have attempted to state——

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. FORAKER. Is the Senator speaking to the amendment which was just read?

Mr. SIMMONS. That amendment has already been passed. I rose for the purpose of offering another amendment.

Mr. FORAKER. I want to say a word about the amendment just read. It was announced passed before I could get the attention of the Chair. Before we get away from it, I should like to call attention to the fact that it is not, I think, properly drawn.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will yield to the Senator for that purpose, without surrendering the floor.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina yields to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FORAKER. I am very much obliged to the Senator.

As I understand the amendment as it was read a moment ago, it requires that the complete record made before the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be attached to the bill of complaint, or shall be filed with it. It seems to me that it would be better to adopt the usual provision in that respect in all the States—I have examined a number of them—that after the suit has been commenced, upon notice to the Commission, the Commission shall furnish this complete report by sending it to the court, where the court shall give to it such consideration as the court may deem it entitled to. It does not seem to me that it is proper to require that it shall be certified and attached to the bill of complaint and be filed with it at the very beginning of the suit.

I wish to add, however, that in whatever form it may be adopted, if we are going to put in the bill any statement as to what evidence shall be heard by the court, for fear that the expression of one class would exclude all other classes, I want to add if this amendment is adhered to——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio move that the vote by which the amendment was adopted be reconsidered?

Mr. GALLINGER (to Mr. FORAKER). Ask unanimous consent.

Mr. FORAKER. I ask that it be considered as open.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from Ohio that the vote by which the amendment was agreed to be reconsidered? There is no objection, and the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] is before the Senate.

Mr. FORAKER. I ask that the following may be added to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio proposes an amendment to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. FORAKER. I propose to add:

Any party to such action may introduce original evidence in addition to the transcript of the evidence offered to said Commission.

I read those words from the provision for a court review adopted by the Ohio legislature in the statute recently enacted. I do it only because I think if we mention any class of evidence it might be held that that was intended to exclude the consideration of any other evidence, and I do not suppose any Senator has offered it with any such idea as that. When we give the court jurisdiction to hear and determine as to the order, whether or not it shall be enforced, annulled, or modified, the court has complete control, I presume, of the trial and can hear whatever evidence it may deem competent. But if we recite any class of evidence we ought to make it clear that any kind of evidence will be received.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] the following words:

Any party to such action may introduce original evidence in addition to the transcript of the evidence offered to the Commission.

Mr. NELSON. I should like to hear the whole amendment now read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. At the request of the Senator from Minnesota the amendment of the Senator from Virginia as proposed to be amended by the amendment of the Senator from Ohio will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

In any such suit the bill or other complaint shall be accompanied by a full copy of the record made on the hearing of the case before the Interstate Commerce Commission, and all of the testimony therein, which shall be certified and furnished by the Commission to the complainant on demand. Any party to such action may introduce original evidence in addition to the transcript of the evidence offered to the Commission.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I wish to offer an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. KEAN. That is not in order, being an amendment in the third degree.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. DANIEL. I had in my hand and intended to offer, if the Senator from Ohio had not done so, an amendment in the nature of an amendment to the like effect, but with a proviso thereto which I hope it may be agreeable to his mind to accept. I would accept his amendment and suggest this proviso, which I ask the Secretary to take down, as I have written it in pencil on this paper:

Provided it is such as could not have been obtained by due diligence while the case was before the Interstate Commerce Commission.

A word on that, Mr. President, and then I will take my seat.

The great difficulty is in getting the full case made up as speedily as possible. It is recognized that the suit which will be brought by the carrier is an original suit, but it is desired to preserve the testimony already taken. In the event that the party may have discovered other testimony which he had no opportunity to put in before the Interstate Commerce Commission this amendment saves him from surprise and from any possible disparagement. So all the evidence he could possibly produce he will have the full opportunity to present in the hearing of his cause, but he is not to trifle with the matter while it is before the Interstate Commerce Commission and compel a rethrashing of the same old straw.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, I will state the trouble about accepting his amendment, and I would accept it without any hesitation except for this trouble. The proceeding before the Interstate Commerce Commission is to be hereafter as it has always been heretofore—irregular; that is to say, there are no formal pleadings filed; no issue is arrived at. The whole hearing is upon a complaint and in such manner as the Commission may direct. While it is true that after the Commission has made orders in its experience heretofore and the same case has been taken to the court much evidence has been introduced in the court that was not introduced before the Commission, that has not been as a rule through any unwillingness on the part of the carrier or other party to produce it there, but solely because no issue had been made up that advised counsel what testimony should be presented; and not until the Commission has made its order and announced its opinion, in many instances of which I happen to have knowledge, have counsel been advised what really was the competent testimony that should be produced. Then when it went to the court where issues were made up by pleadings they proceeded in accordance with the rules governing the admission of testimony.

If we were to adopt the proviso of the Senator from Virginia, it might do a great injustice. I think it is better to leave it with the court, and I hope the Senator will accept my amendment without any modification.

[Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas addressed the Senate. See Appendix.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the proposed amendment of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. KEAN. Do I understand that the Senator from Virginia has accepted the amendment of the Senator from Ohio?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will make the inquiry after the amendment presented by the Senator from Virginia has been read.

The SECRETARY. After the word "courts," the last word in the amendment agreed to, which was offered by the Senator from Iowa, insert:

In any such suit the bill or other complaint shall be accompanied by a full copy of the record made on the hearing of the case before the Interstate Commerce Commission and of all the testimony therein, which shall be certified and furnished by the Commission to the complainant on demand.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. To that the Senator from Ohio offered an amendment, which will be stated.

The Secretary read as follows:

Any party to such action may introduce original evidence in addition to the transcript of the evidence furnished by the Commission.

Mr. FORAKER. Does the Senator from Virginia accept that?

Mr. DANIEL. I will accept it, but move to add to it——

Mr. DOLLIVER. Would it be disagreeable to the Senator from Ohio to add that this new evidence shall be evidence which the complainant could not, by the use of reasonable diligence, have presented to the Commission?

Mr. DANIEL. If in order, I will offer the amendment I suggested to the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the Senator from Virginia, having accepted the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, a further amendment is in order now.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, I am very glad to find that my own mind is working so nearly in accord with those of two such able lawyers as the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Ohio, and I wish to be in as accommodating a spirit as I feel the full and perfect justice of this case may require. The difficulty has been in getting a full case made before the Interstate Commerce Commission. The result has been that the public justice has been disparaged and all the parties to the case have been disappointed by a thin and imperfect presentation of a case which is afterwards fully presented.

A proper construction and a plain construction of the words which I would now append, it seems to me, is broad enough to perfect the matter so that nobody can be surprised or injured—that is to say, by limiting the new evidence to such as could not have been obtained by due diligence while the case was before the Interstate Commerce Commission. If the Senator from Ohio will suggest any more elastic words to be added to "due diligence" which would the better reach any new aspect of the case, I would be glad to accept that also, for I do not intend to cut anybody off from a presentation of the proper defense of the case to the court when it is heard.

Mr. FORAKER. I think the best way to do is to say nothing at all about the evidence that shall be heard by the court.

Mr. DANIEL. If that were the case——

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. DANIEL. If the Senator will just let me answer that point, I am afraid if that be the case the court would treat the matter entirely de novo, and would not get the benefit of the testimony, and would have to do it all over again. That is the reason why we want some limitations.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

Mr. RAYNER. May I interrupt the Senator? My own judgment is that if you adopt that amendment you kill this bill.

Mr. DANIEL. This amendment?

Mr. RAYNER. Yes, sir; if you adopt that amendment you do not give the parties any due process of law. You can not confine it to testimony taken before the Commission. Everyone when he came into court would have a perfect right to take whatever testimony he wants, without any regard to any testimony taken before the Commission. Due process of law under the Constitution gives them that right, and you can not say they have had due process of law before an administrative body. This is not an appeal. It is not a review, and it is not a certiorari, as the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] suggests. It is an original proposition, and you must give them an unlimited right to produce whatever witnesses or testimony they want. If you do not, you interfere with the constitutional right of due process of law. I call upon the Senate not to adopt that amendment, unless you want to kill the bill, because that is the vital point.

Mr. FORAKER. I have said all that the Senator from Maryland has just now so well said.

Mr. RAYNER. I did not hear you.

Mr. FORAKER. That was the very point of my interruption of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. RAYNER. I was in the gallery.

Mr. FORAKER. I will say to him that I do not think we ought to say anything about what evidence should be heard, but leave that to the court. But if we say anything at all as to what testimony shall be heard, we must go further and say something that would save it from the objection made so well by the Senator from Maryland. I suggest that we might provide for "any original evidence that may be competent."

Mr. RAYNER. I will say to the Senator from Ohio that I doubt very much whether you can make this testimony prima facie evidence.

Mr. FORAKER. I am not trying to make it prima facie.

Mr. RAYNER. It has been made prima facie evidence. But if you go a step further and preclude any party from giving any testimony in court in reference to his case, you deprive him of his constitutional right. It runs through the whole bill, in my humble judgment, and defeats the bill, for it is the vital part of it.

Mr. DANIEL. If the Senator from Ohio will permit me—or I will wait until he gets through.

Mr. FORAKER. I was starting in to answer the Senator's inquiry when the Senator from Maryland interrupted me. I was about to say that the words "due diligence," employed by the Senator from Virginia—"evidence which the party might by due diligence have secured"—are not broad enough, because the carrier might by due diligence get a dozen witnesses who were immediately about it, whose testimony he had no advice he would have any need of, because there was no issue, and for that reason he did not get them. A man writes a letter to the Commission and the Commission immediately proceeds to hear a complaint. No definite charge is made in many of these cases; there is no answer filed; there is no issue joined, and therefore there is no advice to the party litigant as to what testimony will be received in many of the cases.

Mr. DANIEL. I would add after the words of the amendment of the Senator from Ohio "admitting new and original evidence." I ask that that sentence may be read to me that I may make these words fit in with it.

The Secretary read as follows:

Any party to such action may introduce original evidence in addition to the transcript of the evidence furnished by the Commission.

Mr. RAYNER. I should like to ask the Senator from Virginia a question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. DANIEL. If the Senator will kindly yield a moment, I am trying to frame words to fit in the amendment.

Mr. RAYNER. I do not think you can frame any words that will fit, and I was going to ask——

Mr. DANIEL. I can not be interrupted every moment and do it. I will be glad to yield to the Senator then.

Mr. RAYNER. All right.

Mr. DANIEL. I think this is it, Mr. President:

Provided it is such as could not have been obtained by due diligence while the case was before the Interstate Commerce Commission or is such as the court may deem essential to the justice of the case.

Mr. FORAKER. I suggest that it read "unless it be such as the court may deem essential."

Mr. DANIEL. Very well; that is better, I think. I want, while I am on my feet, to answer the new objection which has come from the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER].

Mr. RAYNER. Let me state it——

Mr. DANIEL. If the Senator from Ohio is through——

Mr. FORAKER. I am through if the Senator has accepted the language which I have suggested.

Mr. DANIEL. Very well.

We have had the suggestion made for the first time, Mr. President, by the Senator from Maryland that, if we make the evidence solemnly taken before the Interstate Commerce Commission prima facie so far as it goes, we are denying to the litigants due process of law, this being a case in which they are entitled to juridical process.

I take issue with the Senator from Maryland on that subject, and confidently claim that the case before the court, when it reaches there with a solemn record made under the inspection and direction of officers of high standing of this Government, taken under oath, is a solemn procedure, and that it is perfectly legitimate to this body, and that it is usual in such cases, to declare the record to be at least prima facie correct and to import what it seems. The only question that has ever been raised and debated, so far as I know, is as to making that record conclusive. We could make it conclusive, not simply prima facie, but for the fact that it is considered that the courts have the right to look into it and see that the party has not been injured in the ways defended and protected by our Constitution. If the Senator from Maryland will read again the case of the San Diego Water Company, where the evidence was taken in a much looser fashion than it is required to be taken here, and will note the emphatic opinion of the Supreme Court in passing upon it, that it was taken with due notice and that the rates were properly fixed under it, I think his mind will be disposed to modify the opinion which he has to-day expressed; and if these words of amendment, such as seem now to meet and comport with the judgment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], are added, the most scrupulous care of the rights of everybody will have been consummated in provisions which give them a perfect remedy—a remedy, in the first instance, to be represented by their attorneys, to have their witnesses heard, to have oaths applied, and to defend their testimony by all the adminicle of jurisprudence; then to have it certified, and then when the case comes before a court, to have it inspected and to allow any additional testimony which could not have been gotten by due diligence before; and then, furthermore—and here is where the Senator's suggestion of lack of due process is fully met and completely defeated—any other evidence which the court may deem essential to the justness of the case, and he may add, if he pleases, "due process of law."

It is simply, Mr. President, to put the hands of Congress on this case and mold it by Congress so as to prevent delay, and the wit of man can not conceive of a rounder or a more complete remedy than the carrier or any other party will thus possess.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, the proposition of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] is based upon a false assumption. It is based upon the theory that transferring the consideration of a rate case from the Interstate Commerce Commission is in the nature of an appeal. It is nothing of the kind. When the case gets into the circuit court, it is an original suit, commenced there in the first instance. When such a suit is commenced in the circuit court of the United States, there are only two ways in which testimony can be taken. One is by oral testimony and the other is by deposition.

To my mind, the Senator from Virginia goes very far in his amendment. He goes to the verge of unconstitutionality by declaring that whatever testimony is taken before the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be deemed prima facie evidence in the circuit court. It is possible that that may be good; but when he goes a step further and undertakes in any way to limit that court as to what testimony they shall use or not use, and as to what evidence a party to a suit shall use or not use, he clearly invades constitutional rights, and to that extent the provision would be a nullity.

I trust that such an amendment as the Senator from Virginia has suggested will not be incorporated in the bill; at all events, not the last amendment suggested by him. I trust the Senator will omit the latter part of his amendment. I can vote for the first part of it, making the testimony taken before the Interstate Commerce Commission prima facie evidence; but when he undertakes to limit the power of the circuit court as to the testimony which shall be taken and used in a case being tried in that court, he goes further than he is entitled to go by law.

[Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas addressed the Senate. See Appendix.]

Mr. HALE. Unless some Senator is prepared to move to adjourn, I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine withdraw his motion?

Mr. HALE. For the time being.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon is recognized.

Mr. FULTON. I do not intend——

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator yield to me to try to get an agreement?

Mr. FULTON. I am not going to speak over three minutes, and then I will yield.

I do not intend to take up any time in discussing this question. I simply want to say that I am very clearly of the opinion, and I have been, that the carrier should be confined to the testimony taken before the Interstate Commerce Commission, unless it can be shown that by the exercise of due diligence that testimoney could not have been presented at the hearing.

I wish to submit that the contention that this would not afford them due process of law can not have any sound foundation. They have notice in advance that if they wish to offer further testimony when they get into court they must produce that testimony before the Commission. Will any Senator who is contending that that would deny them due process of law tell me that the legislative body might not require a party proposing to go into court to take his testimony by way of depositions or otherwise in advance, except in a case where he is entitled to a trial by jury, and that by such a requirement he would be denied due process of law?

Mr. President, due process of law means, so far as judicial investigation is concerned, that the party shall have an opportunity to submit his case and the evidence to the court. He may be required to take that evidence in advance, but that is not denying him due process of law. So I submit that the parties should be required to produce their testimony before the Interstate Commerce Commission, unless they can show some reason for not having done so.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I move that when the Senate adjourn to-night it be to meet at 10 o'clock on Monday morning.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina moves that when the Senate adjourns to-night it be to meet at 10 o'clock on Monday morning. The question is on that motion.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator will make it 11 o'clock.

Mr. TILLMAN. Is the motion carried, Mr. President?

Mr. HALE. The motion is not carried, because it is not understood. Nobody knew what was going on.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will restate it. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet at 10 o'clock on Monday next.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator propose to follow that up?

Mr. TILLMAN. I propose to follow it up, if the Senate will put that through, by asking for unanimous consent to vote before we adjourn on Monday night.

Mr. HALE. The Senator will not get that consent, and can not get it. Some of us have not taken twenty minutes of the whole time. There are provisions in this bill that are of most vital importance. Section 8, which deals with the construction of the Commission, is a section that I do not propose to be shut out from discussing by any agreement which will call upon us to vote finally before that section is reached. I am one of those who believe that too much time has been spent in looking at the other end—the judicial end—of this question.

I want a great Commission; I want to dignify it; I want to make it of such importance and to pay it so much, that in every circuit where a member is appointed he shall be taken from that circuit, and shall be the first man in that circuit for this service. When that is done, half of the trouble about this whole matter will be ended, and the deliberations and the decisions of the Commission will carry weight as they have not heretofore. I say this without meaning to reflect upon the present Commission; but, I repeat, that too much time has been given here to the other end of the matter; and now we are asked to agree to a vote by which section 8 may not be reached at all, and the real thing in this bill—that is, to create a great Commission, whose decisions and mandates shall carry effect with them, so that any court will hesitate before it interferes with them—has not been touched on. Nobody has argued it, because we have not reached it. I shall not consent, Mr. President, that any agreement shall be made that may cut off the consideration of what to me is of primal and profound importance in this matter, and that is the tribunal that initiates and first tries these cases.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Maine that we have had a great deal of unnecessary talk and that we have devoted a great deal of time to trivial and unimportant matters and there have been repetition and duplication of speeches.

Mr. HALE. Certainly the Senator can not charge me with that.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am not charging anybody, but I am trying to speak what I believe to be the truth, and that is that we have had a great deal of unnecessary discussion on this bill on points that have been determined by the Senate over and over again.

Mr. HALE. We have had nearly three months of what is called "general debate," and we have had a little more than a week of debate under the fifteen-minute rule, which was intended to give an opportunity to all Senators for fifteen-minute speeches. The time of the Senate under the fifteen-minute rule has been taken up by the half dozen Senators who did all the talking in the general debate.

Mr. TILLMAN. I can not help that. I am merely stating what I believe to be a fact.

Mr. HALE. I will not rest passively under the imputation that there has been here a disposition, shared in by the Senate generally, to postpone or delay this measure. I am not a miserable sinner in that regard. I have not repeated. But there are things in this bill that I propose to take hold of and adjust, and I will not make any agreement or consent to an agreement that will cut me off and other Senators who feel as I do. There are Senators here wanting to be heard who have not yet been able to get the floor and be recognized.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am the last man to try to cut off anybody from speaking who wants to speak on this bill. If the Senator from Maine can suggest a method by which we can reach a vote on the amendments. I hope he will do so. There are a hundred of them, or such matter. I do not know how many of them will appear still-born and never be offered. The way we are going on we will be here another month. If the Senator from Maine will agree, or if I can get the Senate to agree, or if he will make a suggestion from his long experience as to how we may make progress more rapidly and not have the appearance of dragooning the Senate, I should like him to do so.

Mr. HALE. I will tell the Senator. He and I have both seen ironbound agreements made which were carried out in accordance with their provisions, where many Senators have been shut out and important considerations have never been permitted to come before the body. Now, that is the result of agreeing upon a time for taking the last vote. I hope we may meet at 10 o'clock on Monday, and that before we adjourn we will have considered the things in this bill that are in the minds of Senators and ought to be considered. I will agree that so far as I am concerned I will not intrude by taking up any undue time of the Senate. But I am not willing now, at this stage, under the very conditions that the Senator has described, of scores of amendments having been piled up and not having been considered, to agree upon a time when the final vote shall be taken. On Monday I will help him to get through, if possible. I will say to the Senator——

Mr. TILLMAN. I want to ask the Senator, and I ask the Senate in connection with the Senator himself, whether or not, if I should undertake, as the Senator in charge of this bill, to assume the responsibility of asking the Senate to lay on the table amendments which to me seem trivial or repetitions, or a mere waste of time to discuss things which have been discussed and discussed and killed and killed and killed and killed, and yet we go on repeating, repeating, repeating, the Senator and the Senate will back me up?

Mr. HALE. The Senator need not ask me that question, because I am the only Senator who thus far has had the temerity to move to lay anything on the table.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have moved to lay a lot of amendments on the table, but the Senate did not sustain me.

Mr. HALE. I had forgotten that.

Mr. TILLMAN. Therefore I have become very chary and cautious and modest about repeating it.

Mr. HALE. It is my idea that before we get to the determination of this business, in order to clear away the wreckage, we will have to resort to the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. TILLMAN. Would the Senator call this book [exhibiting] a record? We have not gotten a third way through it. A great many amendments are pending here, and the egotism, if I may use the word, or vanity of the men who have offered them will cause them to feel compelled to offer them and to speak to them.

Mr. HALE. I mean the subjects that have already been considered and voted on, and yet Senators try to renew them. I call that wreckage. We can get rid of that.

Mr. TILLMAN. I was going to ask unanimous consent, but the Senator from Maine having notified me that he will not agree to any time being fixed, I will move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. LODGE obtained the floor.

Mr. NELSON. I move to amend the motion——

Mr. LODGE. I thought I was recognized.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts is entitled to the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. LODGE. I want to say a word.

Mr. ALDRICH. Is this a debatable question, Mr. President?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is not. The debate is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. LODGE. Very well; then I have nothing to say.

Mr. NELSON. I move to amend the motion of the Senator from South Carolina by changing it from 10 to 11 o'clock.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota moves to amend the motion of the Senator from South Carolina to the effect that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet at 11 instead of 10 o'clock on Monday.

The amendment was agreed to.

The motion as amended was agreed to.

Mr. NELSON. A motion to lay on the table was made by the Senator from Maine.

Mr. DANIEL. The Senator withdrew his motion.

Mr. HALE. It is the understanding that the amendment of the Senator from Virginia shall go over until Monday.

Mr. FORAKER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 52 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, May 14, 1906, at 11 o'clock a. m.

SENATE.

MONDAY, May 14, 1906.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. EDWARD E. HALE.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last, when, on request of Mr. KEAN, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Journal stands approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a memorial of Post J, Indiana Division, Travelers' Protective Association of America, of Evansville, Ind., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called "parcels-post bill;" which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. PLATT presented petitions of sundry citizens of New York City, Albany, and Yonkers, all in the State of New York, and of sundry citizens of Sidney, Nebr., praying for the enactment of legislation to remove the duty on denaturized alcohol; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. NELSON. I present a memorial relating to the rate bill, which I ask may be read and lie on the table.

There being no objection, the memorial was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

[Telegram.]

ST. PAUL, MINN., May 12, 1906.

Hon. KNUTE NELSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

As you know, I am in full sympathy with the main features of the amendment proposed to the interstate-commerce act, but I desire to protest against the injustice of the proposed amendment imposing fine and imprisonment on officers and agents of railway companies for allowing rebates. Such penalties can never be inflicted upon presidents and high officials of 160,000 miles of railways of this country, who live in New York and do not deal directly with rates, while their demand for more revenue will induce some freight agent on a salary of three or four thousand dollars a year to grant a rebate. Make the penalty as high as you please against the railway company. This is the only way to reach the railway czars and grand dukes. The penalty of imprisonment was in existence for many years and only one man, a poor freight agent trying to support his family on a meager salary, was imprisoned.

A. B. STICKNEY.

Mr. BURNHAM presented a memorial of the New England Hardware Dealers' Association, remonstrating against the passage of the so-called "parcels-post" bill; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a petition of the national committee on legislation, Patriotic Order Sons of America, of Odenton, Md., praying for the enactment of legislation to restrict immigration; which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. FRYE, introduced a bill (S. 6150) to authorize the appointment of Joshua L. Chamberlain, late a brigadier and brevet major-general of volunteers, to be a brigadier-general in the Army on the retired list; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 6151) granting an increase of pension to Mark Ham; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 6152) concerning licensed officers of sail vessels; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HEMENWAY introduced a bill (S. 6153) granting an increase of pension to William F. Browning; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 6154) granting an increase of pension to Edwin Freeman; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 6155) granting an increase of pension to Samuel H. Davis; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PENROSE introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Claims:

A bill (S. 6156) for the relief of George W. Schroyer (with accompanying paper);

A bill (S. 6157) for the relief of S. K. Yundt;

A bill (S. 6158) for the relief of John G. Stauffer & Son;

A bill (S. 6159) for the relief of parties from whom cigars were seized on account of bearing counterfeit stamps (with accompanying paper);

A bill (S. 6160) for the relief of the Columbia National Bank, of Columbia, Pa. (with accompanying paper); and

A bill (S. 6161) for the relief of the estate of David B. Landis, deceased, and the estate of Jacob F. Sheaffer, deceased (with accompanying paper).

Mr. PENROSE introduced a bill (S. 6162) granting a pension to Matilda Kuhn; which was read twice by itis title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WETMORE introduced a bill (S. 6163) granting an increase of pension to William H. Westcott; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DUBOIS. I regret that my colleague [Mr. HEYBURN] is quite ill, and I am sure the Senate shares in that regret. I fear he will not be able to be here during the remainder of the session. In his behalf I introduce a bill.

The bill (S. 6164) granting an increase of pension to Julius S. Cuendet was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CARTER introduced a bill (S. 6165) granting to Beaver Lodge, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, of Ekalaka, Mont., certain lands for public cemetery purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

NAVAL STATION, KEY WEST, FLA.

Mr. TALIAFERRO submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $94,200 for dredging and filling in and other improvements at the naval station at Key West, Fla., intended to be proposed by him to the naval appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

SCHOOLS IN ALASKA.

Mr. TELLER submitted the following concurrent resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to use, at his discretion, for the native schools and reindeer enterprises in Alaska, the unexpended balance of "the license fund for schools outside of incorporated towns in Alaska," which was collected for schools in Alaska previous to January 27, 1905, the same being, after outstanding obligations are paid, $6,221.84, and is hereby appropriated for such purpose.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed, and the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL], which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 17 of the bill, after the word "courts," the last word in the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] and agreed to, insert:

In any such suit the bill or other complaint shall be accompanied by a full copy of the record made on the hearing of the case before the Interstate Commerce Commission, and of all the testimony therein, which shall be certified and furnished by the Commission to the complainant, on demand. Any party to such suit may introduce original evidence in addition to the transcript of the evidence furnished by the Commission: Provided, That it is such evidence as could not have been obtained by due diligence while the case was before the Interstate Commerce Commission, or is such as the court may deem essential to the justice of the case.

Mr. DANIEL. I desire to withdraw the last sentence in the amendment, as to what the court may deem essential to the justice of the case.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the modification made by the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. DANIEL. I will ask that the amendment be read, and then I will indicate it.

The Secretary read as follows:

In any such suit the bill or other complaint shall be accompanied by a full copy of the record made on the hearing of the case before the Interstate Commerce Commission and of all the testimony therein, which shall be certified and furnished by the Commission to the complainant on demand. Any party to such suit may introduce original evidence in addition to the transcript of the evidence furnished by the Commission: Provided, That it is such evidence as could not have been obtained by due diligence while the case was before the Interstate Commerce Commission, or is such as the court may deem essential to the justice of the case.

Mr. DANIEL. I ask leave to leave out the words "or is such as the court may deem essential to the justice of the case."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment as modified by the Senator from Virginia.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to modify the proposed amendment by striking out the following words at the end thereof.

Or is such as the court may deem essential to the justice of the case.

Mr. DANIEL. I ask leave to withdraw those words. I think I have the right to withdraw them.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia has a right to withdraw them.

Mr. DANIEL. Now, an explanation is due to the Senate. I was about to observe that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] is not in his seat, and I did not wish this matter acted on in his absence.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio is present.

Mr. DANIEL. I was delaying hoping he would be here. I see the Senator has now come in.

I beg leave to state to the Senate that we have now before this body the amendment that was being considered late Saturday afternoon, when in answer to a suggestion of the Senator from Ohio I assented to the addition of the words which I now ask to withdraw, and I will state my reasons for doing so.

What is desired, Mr. President, is that the evidence that is fully taken in a case shall not be taken a second time, and if this amendment shall be adopted I shall offer the following amendment to consummate the plan of which it is a part:

In any hearing before the Commission under this act or any of the acts aforesaid, the parties thereto shall fully adduce all of their testimony that may be procured by reasonable diligence, and in any proceeding in equity or otherwise to set aside and annul the rates fixed by the Commission as unjust and as unreasonable, no other evidence shall be heard by the court saving only such evidence as the party offering the same may show to the court by proper affidavits could not have been obtained and submitted by reasonable diligence before the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator from Virginia that he is at entire liberty to make such modification of his amendment as he desires.

Mr. DANIEL. Then, having withdrawn those words, I will propose this amendment instead of the one I have already offered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia withdraws his amendment heretofore proposed and offers an amendment which will be read by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the matter intended to be proposed insert the following:

In any hearing before the Commission under this act or any of the acts aforesaid the parties thereto shall fully adduce all of their testimony that may be procured by reasonable diligence, and in any proceeding in equity or otherwise to set aside and annul the rates fixed by the Commission as unjust and as unreasonable no other evidence shall be heard by the court, saving only such evidence as the party offering the same may show to the court by proper affidavits could not have been obtained and submitted by reasonable diligence before the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, one of the great objects sought to be obtained by the shipping people of the United States, whom we should endeavor to subserve in this measure, is a prompt and a full hearing of their cause. How to obtain both is now a most important object to the Senate. One of the main causes of delay has been, as the Supreme Court has time and again remarked, the putting in of small testimony by the carriers before the Interstate Commerce Commission and developing the full testimony after they had gotten into court.

The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] said on Saturday afternoon that instead of looking so much, too much, to court review he thought we ought to look more to upbuilding the Commission. The very object of this amendment is to build up the Commission. He says that we propose to make the Commission a more powerful and a more dignified body than it has been heretofore. All the more does it behoove us, therefore, to attach more importance to what they have done and not to allow it to be regarded as a nonentity, as has been the case heretofore.

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] suggests that this is a bill of equity that we are legislating concerning, and not an appeal, and so I think was suggested also by the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE].

There are three cases in the Supreme Court in which this very question has been gone over. The one is the case of the Cherokee Land Scrip, where a procedure was styled as a "bill" and was treated as a bill in equity. Another is a case of the California land grants, where the procedure was made by petition, and not called a bill in equity. Another is the case of Duell before the Patent Office, in which appeals were declared to lie from the administrative procedures in the Patent Office to the courts. Congress has complete jurisdiction to regulate the practices and orders of procedure of courts of equity.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. DANIEL. In one moment. The Supreme Court, under authority from Congress, has put ninety-four new rules of equity into the practice of the inferior courts under our authority and from no constitutional jurisdiction of its own. What we recommend here is simply a matter of practice, and, as shown by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. FULTON], who is now upon his feet, in his great remarks on Saturday last, it is entirely legitimate within well-known orders of judicial and legislative procedure.

Now, if the Senate is really in mind and desirous to aid the shippers of this country to get an early and a full hearing of their case, here is the method to obtain that good end. If the Senate will fix its attention upon this system of review, which it is itself proposing to modify through some most advantageous and desirable elements of the Allison amendment, it will succeed in doing so without the necessity of shearing any court of its proper and legitimate jurisdiction or raising any question of law which is of doubtful use.

Mr. FULTON. I wish to ask the Senator a question, if he will allow me. I will premise my question with the statement that, so far as the principle of requiring testimony to be adduced before the Commission is concerned, and all the testimony that the party by the exercise of reasonable diligence can adduce, I am in sympathy with him; but I call the Senator's attention to the fact that his amendment provides—I am not giving the exact language, but that is the effect—that in any suit or proceeding to set aside the order of the Commission on the ground that it is unjust and unreasonable the party shall do so and so. It seems to me that that amendment would directly authorize the review of an order of the Commission on the ground that it was unjust and unreasonable, and thus go to the question of reviewing the discretion of the Commission.

Mr. DANIEL. I will ask the Secretary to again read the last amendment which I offered.

The SECRETARY. After the word "courts," on page 17, insert:

In any hearing before the Commission under this act or any of the acts aforesaid the parties thereto shall fully adduce all of their testimony that may be procured by reasonable diligence, and in any proceeding in equity or otherwise to set aside and annul the rates fixed by the Commission as unjust and as unreasonable no other evidence shall be heard by the court, saving only such evidence as the party offering the same may show to the court by proper affidavits could not have been obtained and submitted by reasonable diligence before the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, I am perfectly willing to leave out the words "and as unreasonable," as the Senator has suggested. I am using the terms "unjust" and "unreasonable" as they have been explained by the decisions of the Supreme Court, that they will not regard the question as one of constitutionality unless it is so unreasonable as to be unjust in the sense of not rendering just compensation, and that is conformable to the present framework of the Allison amendment. But I am very willing to leave out the words "and as unreasonable," and will do so.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will modify the amendment as requested by the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. HOPKINS. I should like to ask the Senator from Virginia a question before he takes his seat.

Mr. DANIEL. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. Under the bill as it is framed now, does not the Commission have the privilege, on proper evidence being presented to it, to modify or make a new order?

Mr. DANIEL. I can not hear the Senator's question.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, we are unable to find the text the Senator from Virginia is proposing to amend. He speaks of page 17. I suppose that is the end of the Allison amendment, but I have not any print before me from which I can see it.

Mr. DANIEL. It has just been offered this morning in lieu of the amendment which we debated Saturday afternoon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio desires to know at what point the amendment comes in.

Mr. FORAKER. At what point in the text?

The SECRETARY. After the word "courts," the last word in the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] and already agreed to.

Mr. FORAKER. That we can not get. Nobody seems to be able to identify that amendment and furnish it to Senators at their desks. I have been asking for it ever since this debate commenced.

Mr. HOPKINS. Now, I should like to put my question to the Senator from Virginia.

If an order is made by the Commission under the bill as it is now framed, the Commission has the power of modifying that order or of setting it aside, has it not?

Mr. DANIEL. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. If that be so, why, then, provide that new evidence can go before the court? If the carrier has evidence that has been discovered, or that it has been able to produce since the order of the Commission was made, why not require it to go before the Commission with that new evidence on an application for a modification of the order instead of going into the court with the new evidence?

Mr. DANIEL. My impression is that the Senate has already voted down an amendment of that sort, but that already the carrier has the right to ask for a modification of the order and to adduce new testimony.

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes. Now, the point I am making——

Mr. DANIEL. But if the carrier should go to the court——

Mr. HOPKINS. That would exclude the idea that the court at any time will ever have a different record before it on the question of the order of the Commission than the evidence which was before the Commission.

Mr. DANIEL. That is just the purpose of it. The purpose of it is to exclude the court from hearing new testimony which the parties could have adduced before the Interstate Commerce Commission and purposely did not; and to meet an evil which the Supreme Court has, as I have repeated here three or four times, frequently pointed out, the failure of the carriers to use their evidence before the Commission and develop it for the first time after they have brought a suit in equity in court.

Mr. HOPKINS. I desire to suggest to the Senator from Virginia that if the amendment as now framed is adopted it will permit the court, under certain conditions, to hear an entirely different case than the one committed to the Commission.

Mr. DANIEL. Only in those cases in which they exercised due diligence to put in their testimony and afterwards found some other testimony which they could not at that time get.

Mr. HOPKINS. Now, is it not better——

Mr. DANIEL. In such cases it is a matter of grace to the carrier.

Mr. HOPKINS. But is it not better when that evidence is discovered to require the carrier to go to the Commission instead of to the court and ask for a modification of the order rather than to take it to court to have the order set aside?

Mr. DANIEL. I would be very glad to do that. If this bill contemplated that, I would be very glad to vote for it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the time of the Senator from Virginia has expired.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I will state in reply to the inquiry of the Senator from Illinois that it is my understanding that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] introduced an amendment involving the procedure to which the Senator from Illinois refers and which he approves, and that that amendment was lost; but it is a very proper amendment.

Mr. HOPKINS. I will say to the Senator from Nevada that that amendment is an entirely different proposition from the one which is now pending. As I understand it, it was not put in the form that I suggested to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. SPOONER and Mr. LA FOLLETTE addressed the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The senior Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SPOONER. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If it is in order, I wish to offer a substitute for the pending amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is in order. The junior Senator from Wisconsin moves a substitute, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. After the word "courts," on page 17, insert:

Upon the trial of any action brought to set aside or modify any order made by the Commission under this section a copy of the evidence introduced by the plaintiff upon motion made upon behalf of the Commission shall be transmitted to the Commission, and the court shall stay further proceedings in such action for fifteen days from the date of such transmission. Upon the receipt of such evidence the Commission shall consider the same, and may alter, modify, amend, or rescind its order relating to such rate or rates, fares, charges, classification, joint rate or rates, regulation, practice, or service complained of in said action, and shall report its action thereon to said court within ten days from the receipt of such evidence.

If the Commission shall rescind its order complained of, the action shall be dismissed; if it shall alter, modify, or amend the same, such altered, modified, or amended order shall take the place of the original order complained of, and judgment shall be rendered thereon as though made by the Commission in the first instance. If the original order shall not be rescinded or changed by the Commission, judgment shall be rendered upon such original order.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I move to lay the amendment on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine moves to lay the substitute proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] on the table.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. On that I will ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HOPKINS. I wish to know if the Senator from Maine will not suspend that motion until we can hear from the Senator offering the substitute?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there a second to the demand for the yeas and nays?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment may be read.

Mr. ALDRICH, Mr. FRYE, and others. Too late!

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] rose before a response had been made to the roll call. The Secretary will again state the proposed amendment.

The Secretary again read Mr. LA FOLLETTE's amendment to the amendment proposed by Mr. DANIEL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will resume the calling of the roll.

The Secretary resumed the calling of the roll.

Mr. SPOONER (when his name was called). As I announced the other day, I am paired with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK], who is absent. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when Mr. WARREN's name was called). I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. WARREN] from the city. I desire also to announce that he is paired with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY]. I make this announcement for the remainder of the day.

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 41, nays 30, as follows:

YEAS—41.

Aldrich	Clark, Wyo.	Gamble	Perkins
Alger	Crane	Hale	Piles
Allee	Dick	Hansbrough	Platt
Allison	Dillingham	Hemenway	Proctor
Brandegee	Dolliver	Kean	Scott
Bulkeley	Dryden	Kittredge	Smoot
Burkett	Flint	Lodge	Sutherland
Burnham	Foraker	Long	Wetmore
Burrows	Frye	McCumber
Carter	Fulton	Nixon
Clark, Mont.	Gallinger	Penrose

NAYS—30.

Bacon	Foster	McLaurin	Simmons
Berry	Frazier	Mallory	Stone
Blackburn	Gearin	Martin	Taliaferro
Clay	Hopkins	Morgan	Teller
Culberson	Knox	Newlands	Tillman
Cullom	La Follette	Overman	Warner
Daniel	McCreary	Pettus
Dubois	McEnery	Rayner

NOT VOTING—18.

Ankeny	Clapp	Heyburn	Patterson
Bailey	Clarke, Ark.	Latimer	Spooner
Beveridge	Depew	Millard	Warren
Burton	Elkins	Money
Carmack	Gorman	Nelson

So Mr. LA FOLLETTE's amendment to the amendment proposed by Mr. DANIEL was laid upon the table.

Mr. HALE. I now renew the motion I made on Saturday and withdrew, to lay the pending amendment on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine moves to lay the pending amendment on the table. [Putting the question.] The "ayes" have it and the amendment is rejected.

Mr. DANIEL. I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. TELLER. What is now the pending question, Mr. President?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill itself.

Mr. TELLER. Have we passed the stage for amendments?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will resume the reading of the bill.

Mr. TELLER. The reading of the bill, then, has not yet been completed?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It has not. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the bill.

Mr. DANIEL. I desire to offer an amendment. On page 9, in the section relative to the venue in suits, line 6, after the word "office," I move to insert—and I ask the Secretary to take down the words——

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

Mr. DANIEL. I ask the Senator from Kansas not to interrupt me until I am through with the sentence.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia declines to yield.

Mr. DANIEL. On page 9 of the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], after the word "office," in line 6, I move to insert the following words——

Mr. DANIEL. On page 9.

Mr. CULLOM. May I interrupt the Senator from Virginia long enough to say that he has not the bill before him, but has a print of some amendment?

Mr. DANIEL. I have the amendments intended to be offered by Mr. ALLISON——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed to be offered by the Senator from Virginia will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 17 of the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] and agreed to, after the words "operating office," it is proposed to insert——

Mr. DANIEL. That is the correct place. At that point I move to insert:

And such suit shall be brought in thirty days after the entry of any such order or requirement of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and not afterwards.

A word of explanation, Mr. President——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I should like to know at what point the Senator wishes to insert that amendment?

Mr. DANIEL. On page 9. Before yielding I desire to say a few words in explanation of this amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa is to an amendment already agreed to. If so, the Senator's amendment is out of order at this stage of the bill.

Mr. DANIEL. Then, Mr. President, I move to insert at the close of that amendment the following words:

Such suit to enjoin, set aside, annul, or suspend any order or requirement of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be brought in thirty days after the entry of any such order or requirement of the Commission, and not afterwards.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands the amendment just proposed by the Senator from Virginia to be an amendment to an amendment already agreed to.

Mr. DANIEL. Not at all, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If that be so, the amendment is still out of order.

Mr. DANIEL. But, Mr. President, it is not an amendment to anything already agreed to. This matter has not been brought up before. It is an independent proposition.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If it is an entirely independent proposition, then, of course, it is in order.

Mr. DANIEL. It is an entirely independent proposition.

Mr. KEAN. In what section does the Senator propose his amendment?

Mr. DANIEL. After the Allison amendment.

Mr. KEAN. To what section of the bill?

Mr. DANIEL. There are so many editions of these amendments that I am not certain that I have the copy before me which is now before the Senate. If a page will bring me a copy of the bill which is now pending before the Senate, I will examine it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate will suspend its proceedings until the Senator from Virginia has submitted his proposed amendment.

Mr. DANIEL. As an independent proposition.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There are several prints of the bill.

Mr. DANIEL. I ask that I may be furnished with a copy of the bill that is pending before the Senate. I have the one which has been laid on my desk.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. DANIEL. For a question.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. My question is directed to the Chair, but I think it is as valuable to the Senator from Virginia as to myself. I want to know whether or not there has been a reprint of the bill containing all the amendments agreed to up to the time of our last adjournment? It is difficult for Senators to find just where the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia comes in in the print which is now before us.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There has been no reprint up to the adjournment on Saturday evening.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Then there is no reprint of the bill really showing the place where the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia comes in.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

Mr. DANIEL. I have the floor.

Mr. ALDRICH. But I rise to a point of order.

Mr. DANIEL. I have the floor, and the Senator can not rise in order to a point of order while I have the floor.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think I can.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. DANIEL. Not to make a point of order.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am not asking the Senator from Virginia to yield to me. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. TELLER. I rise to a question of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Rhode Island will state his point of order.

Mr. ALDRICH. My point of order is that the amendment is not in order; that it is an amendment to an amendment already agreed to, and is therefore not in order.

Mr. DANIEL. I do not offer the amendment as an amendment to an amendment already agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is endeavoring to ascertain from the Senator from Virginia whether his amendment is an independent proposition or whether it is proposed to an amendment which has already been agreed to.

Mr. ALDRICH. It refers to language in the substitute which is included in the amendment already agreed to; and therefore is not in order.

Mr. DANIEL. The amendment as I now wish to offer it has not the words "such suit" in it.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think it has.

Mr. DANIEL. It had originally, but——

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. DANIEL. With pleasure.

Mr. TELLER. I do not want the Senator to yield to me. I rise to a question of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado will state his question of order.

Mr. DANIEL. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. TELLER. I do not want the Senator from Virginia to yield to me. I do not want to take up the Senator's time.

Mr. DANIEL. The Senator can do as he pleases about that. I can be courteous to him whether he is to me or not.

Mr. TELLER. I want to have the floor in my own time on the question of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado will state his question of order.

Mr. TELLER. I want to find out what print of the bill is before the Senate, so that we may know where we may look to find where proposed amendments are to come in. I understand that the print of the bill before the Senate is that which was reported on February 26.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair so understands.

Mr. TELLER. Then, Mr. President, amendments should be addressed to that bill. Otherwise it will be utterly impossible for us to determine what effect the proposed amendment would have unless we knew the particular point where it was to appear in the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado is entirely correct; and the Chair would suggest to the Senator from Virginia that his amendment be addressed to the print of the bill reported to the Senate February 26.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, after the place in that bill in which was inserted the Allison amendment, I move, as an independent proposition, the words which I have stated. Now I ask that those words may be read.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator from Virginia permit me to make a suggestion?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Virginia send the proposed amendment to the Secretary's desk with the point clearly indicated at which it is proposed to be inserted in the bill?

Mr. DANIEL. As there is no bill printed, Mr. President, with the amendments in it, I can not send to the desk what is not before me. I have had one of the pages looking to see if he could find such a print of the bill, but there seems to be none here.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will permit me to suggest——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. DANIEL. I yield.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment to make a request?

Mr. DANIEL. I have already yielded to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON].

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia has yielded to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. TILLMAN. There is so much confusion in the various prints and reprints of the bill that it is difficult for Senators to find what they want and to have it before them when they want to insert amendments. I therefore ask that the Public Printer be immediately ordered to send to the Senate a copy of the bill as it was when we quit work on Saturday night, so that we may know what has been done up to date.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I suggest that the amendments agreed to shall in the proposed reprint be printed in italics, so that we may be able to distinguish them.

Mr. TILLMAN. Of course I want the amendments which have been agreed to printed in italics, so that when the reprint comes to us it will appear on its face what amendments have already been agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BACON. I thought the Senator had yielded to me.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understood the Senator from Iowa to rise to the question proposed by the Senator from South Carolina. The Chair will put the request of the Senator from South Carolina. Is there objection to a reprint of the bill as it stood on Saturday evening? The Chair hears none, and that order is made. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BACON. I simply——

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. ALLISON. I only wish to make a suggestion, but I will not ask the Senator to yield if he wishes to speak. I intended to make an effort——

Mr. BACON. I have no objection to yielding, except that the time of the Senator from Virginia is being consumed.

Mr. ALLISON. I will make a simple suggestion to the Senator from Virginia, and that is that his amendment should go in on page 17 of the printed bill, after the amendment that is already in the bill on line 14.

Mr. BACON. That is what I have been trying to say for ten minutes, but I was not permitted to do it.

Mr. ALLISON. I would have been glad to have said it before, but I did not have an opportunity. I am much obliged to the Senator for allowing me to say it, instead of saying it himself.

Mr. FRYE. Please let the amendment be reported in the place suggested by the Senator from Iowa.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the proposed amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 17, before line 15, it is proposed to insert:

Any suit to enjoin, set aside, annul, or suspend any order or requirement of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be brought within thirty days after the entry of any such order or requirement of the Commission, and not afterwards.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment just stated.

Mr. MORGAN. Is the amendment of the Senator from Virginia a new proposition?

Mr. DANIEL. It is a new proposition.

Mr. MORGAN. And to be inserted in a point of the bill where no amendment has as yet been agreed to?

Mr. DANIEL. It is an independent proposition.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to inquire of the Chair whether it is now in order for me to offer a substitute for that amendment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is in order for the Senator to offer a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. MORGAN. The substitute that I propose to offer is copied from the existing law, which I think will cover all that the Senator from Virginia desires to accomplish. The existing law on the point raised by the Senator from Virginia controls the action of the circuit court when a suit is brought in that court for the revision or reversal or reconsideration of an order of the railroad commission. The amendment I propose, Mr. President, merely restates the law as it stands on the statute book to-day, and covers, as I think, not only all of the provisions that are necessary to be adopted by the Senate, but also covers a very important constitutional question which has been taken out of the law as it stands to-day by the Hepburn bill, and merely reinstates it. I ask that the amendment be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] proposed as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL].

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the matter intended to be inserted by the Senator from Virginia it is proposed to insert the following:

That if the matters involved in any order or requirement of said Commission are founded upon a controversy requiring a trial by jury, as provided by the seventh amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and any such common carrier shall violate or refuse or neglect to obey or perform the same, after notice given by said Commission as provided in the fifteenth section of the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, as the same is amended by act of Congress approved March 2, 1889, it shall be lawful for any company or person interested in such order or requirement to apply in a summary way by petition to the circuit court of the United States sitting as a court of law in the judicial district in which the carrier complained of has its principal office, or in which the violation or disobedience of such order or requirement shall happen, alleging such violation or disobedience as the case may be; and said court shall by its order fix a time and place for the trial of said cause, which shall not be less than twenty nor more than forty days from the time said order is made; and it shall be the duty of the marshal of the district in which said proceeding is pending to forthwith serve a copy of said petition and of said order upon each of the defendants, and it shall be the duty of the defendants to file their answers to said petition within ten days after the service of the same as aforesaid. At the trial the findings of fact of said Commission, as set forth in its report, shall be prima facie evidence of the matters therein stated, and if either party shall demand a jury or shall omit to waive a jury the court shall, by its order, direct the marshal forthwith to summon a jury to try the cause; but if all the parties shall waive a jury in writing then the court shall try the issues in said cause and render its judgment thereon. Either party may appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States under the same regulations now provided by law in respect to security for such appeal and without regard to the value of the subject in dispute; but such appeal must be taken within twenty days from the day of the rendition of the judgment of said circuit court. If the judgment of the circuit court shall be in favor of the party complaining he or they shall be entitled to recover a reasonable counsel or attorney's fee, to be fixed by the court, which shall be collected as part of the costs in the case. For the purposes of this act, excepting its penal provisions, the circuit courts of the United States shall be deemed to be always in session.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, if that were new matter, or if a word in it were new matter, I should not venture to bring it before the Senate at this late hour in this debate; but no provision has been made in the bill as yet for a jury trial in those cases where the remedy of the complainant, whether it is a railroad company or whether it is a private citizen, is plain, adequate, and complete at law. Such a provision is in the existing law, and it quotes the constitutional article to which it refers. In the preparation of this bill in the House of Representatives that provision was entirely stricken out, and it has not been supplied by any legislation or even attempted to be supplied in the Senate.

I am here to appeal, Mr. President, in favor of a trial by jury in those cases in the circuit courts of the United States that may originate there under this bill, as the Constitution requires a trial by jury if the remedy in the case is plain, adequate, and complete at law. My purpose is to try to prevent the effort that I recognize in this bill, and recognize through the whole of the progress of this attempted legislation, to prevent the equity court, to prevent the chancellors of the United States from being substituted in place of jury trials where the remedy is plain, adequate, and complete at law. I regard that security of the Constitution of the United States against the aggression, which so far obtains in this bill, as being amongst the most personal and beneficial liberties of the citizens of this country; and I am not willing to see this bill passed into a law with that portion of the Constitution stricken out, as it has been stricken out by the committee that reported the bill, and no effort made to reinstate it.

There is not a word of this amendment in controversy in the slightest degree with any provision that this bill contains, after it has been amended to the extent that it has been, and I am here now for the purpose merely of demanding a jury trial in the circuit courts of the United States in all those cases where a party would be entitled to a jury trial, the question being one where the remedy at law is plain, adequate, and complete.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] in the nature of a substitute to the amendment of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL].

Mr. DANIEL. I observe from the printed amendment of the Senator from Alabama that it has been offered as an independent section. As printed, it reads "to strike out the words 'Sec. 16. That,' in line 18, on page 12, and insert the following."

Mr. MORGAN. This is the first offer I have made of it.

Mr. DANIEL. It is the first offer on the floor of the Senate, but it was sent to the desk.

Mr. MORGAN. Oh, well, I have a right to offer it to any part of the bill.

Mr. DANIEL. I understand the Senator has a right to do it, but I was just suggesting that there is now no limitation, as this bill stands, upon the suits that may be brought to set aside——

Mr. McCREARY. Mr. President——

Mr. DANIEL. Please permit me to finish the sentence.

Mr. McCREARY. I am not able to hear the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. DANIEL. I will try to speak louder.

Mr. McCREARY. Let the Senator speak louder, and let there be better order in the Senate.

Mr. DANIEL. As the case stands now, there is no limitation provided for, that I can discern, for the suits that are brought to set aside the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and I should be very glad if the Senator would allow my amendment to be voted on separately and to offer his as an independent proposition.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator can amend the amendment by putting that in if he chooses to do so.

Mr. DANIEL. Of course I could get out of the way of the Senator, but he complicates matters. I think I would vote for his amendment as an independent proposition, and expect to do so.

Mr. MORGAN. I am willing to simplify matters and not complicate them——

Mr. DANIEL. The Senator's amendment does not cover exactly the same thing. This is for all suits.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator from Virginia desires to put a limitation upon the time within which a suit shall be brought in the circuit court that brings in question the action of the railroad commission——

Mr. DANIEL. That is all I am trying to do.

Mr. MORGAN. He can put it in my amendment. I have no objection to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama can modify his amendment, but the Chair is of opinion that as an amendment to the substitute it is not in order.

Mr. MORGAN. I will modify it.

Mr. DANIEL. Withdraw the amendment and immediately reoffer it after mine has been voted upon.

Mr. MORGAN. It is not necessary to withdraw it.

Mr. DANIEL. I know it is not necessary, but——

Mr. MORGAN. Suggest an amendment, and I will accept it.

Mr. DANIEL. I do not want to amend it. I want to have a vote on my amendment as a separate proposition.

Mr. MORGAN. I have no ambition to figure as the author of any amendment to this bill. This law which I ask the Senate to adopt is the law of the land to-day, without the change of a word.

Mr. DANIEL. I will vote for the Senator's amendment if he will offer it not in antagonism to the one I have offered. I think, according to the best reading of the bill that I can give, that my amendment is a desirable one to speed the character of causes with which the preceding section deals. I hope that the Senator will withdraw his amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. With the leave of the Senate, and in order to give the Senator from Virginia his way in the matter, I will withdraw the amendment for the present and will offer it later.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. TELLER. Let us have it read again. It has been changed half a dozen times.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. TELLER. I only want to call for the reading of the amendment before I vote upon it. I want to know what it is.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that it may be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will again be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 17 of the printed bill, after the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa and already agreed to, add as a separate paragraph the following:

> Any suit to enjoin, set aside, annul, or suspend any order or requirement of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be brought within thirty days after the entry of any such order or requirement of the Commission, and not afterward.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I desire to make a suggestion with reference to the amendment. The orders of the Commission, as I understand the bill, are to take effect within not less than twenty days. The amendment of the Senator from Virginia provides that no suit shall be brought after thirty days. So it seems to me that this amendment is inconsistent with the bill as it now stands.

Mr. DANIEL. Of course it means after the order shall have become effective, and I shall be glad to make it more plain, if the Senator from Iowa thinks it should be.

Mr. ALLISON. As I understand the amendment as it now reads, it is that these suits must be brought within thirty days after the order is made.

Mr. DANIEL. That is the expression, but it should be extended as the Senator suggests. That is what it had reference to.

Mr. ALLISON. I wish to make another suggestion, and that is that this suit is to set aside or annul or suspend the order, and therefore it is not so material that the time should be fixed at an early day, if at all, because if a suit is brought, it is to set aside the order, and the order is in force after thirty days or whatever time the Commission may fix. It may fix sixty days. Suppose at the end of sixty days no bill is filed. Then there will be no suspension of the order. This proposition is attached to a provision with respect to setting aside or annulling the order of the Commission. If that order is made and goes into effect, that is the end of the matter, unless afterwards one of the parties seeks to suspend the order already in force. It seems to me that that is rather a radical and harsh provision, not giving sufficient play for the commencement or prosecution of a suit.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. DANIEL. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I make a suggestion to the Senator?

Mr. DANIEL. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. It seems to me that the result of this amendment would be practically to compel the roads, if they desire ever to test the question, to appeal immediately or within the thirty days. Suppose the company can not tell absolutely what the effect of an order is going to be until after the order has been in effect for some time. Is it not better to allow the companies to determine whether or not the order is going to be injurious to them, by attempting to operate under it, before compelling them to take the appeal? The order is in effect only two years, and it seems to me it is best to allow the company to work under the order to see whether its effect will be injurious or not, and not practically require them to take an appeal until they ascertain that some injury will follow.

Again, an order might not be injurious for one year or for eighteen months, and yet there might be such a change after that time that it would be injurious. It seems to me we ought to allow the order to stand and give the carrier the right to institute the suit at any time within the two years in which the order will be effective, whenever the company itself determines that the order is injurious to it.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, first, in answer to the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa, I would change the phraseology of the amendment so as to read "after the order or requirement of the Commission has become effective." It is spoken of there as an entry. It meant to refer to the time when the order became effective, and it is better to say so in express words than by mere implication. So I will ask the Secretary to make that change. Let it read "thirty days after the order or requirement has become effective."

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. DANIEL. Now, in answer to the Senator from North Dakota, I wish to say this——

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. DANIEL. I hope he will allow me to finish——

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Virginia has spoken once upon this amendment.

Mr. DANIEL. The Senator from North Dakota——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair asks the Senator from Virginia whether he has heretofore spoken to this amendment?

Mr. DANIEL. I have spoken for a few minutes. Of course I can not explain my amendment, in answer to objections, unless the Senate allows me an opportunity.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under a strict interpretation of the rule, the Senator has exhausted his right.

Mr. DANIEL. I do not desire to intrude upon the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. I merely wanted to ask a question. I did not want to take the Senator's time.

Mr. BACON. When the Senator spoke before, it was upon the amendment of the Senator from Alabama, which was withdrawn.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair asked the Senator from Virginia whether he had previously spoken on the amendment, and the Chair understood him to say he had.

Mr. DANIEL. I believe it was in respect to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama. But the RECORD will show, and I have no desire to evade or to trench on any rule of the Senate. But I think the Senate will be courteous enough to allow me by unanimous consent to answer the suggestion of a colleague in debate, both of us seeking to reach the truth in this matter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the Senator from Virginia proceeding? The Chair hears none.

Mr. McCUMBER. Assuming that the Senator has spoken, have I not the right to ask a question of the Senator and allow him to answer it? I asked him a question, and it seems to me he has a right to answer it, provided it does not take more than fifteen minutes.

Mr. ALDRICH. Is the Senator from North Dakota willing to assume that he has not concluded?

Mr. McCUMBER. I have concluded only when the Senator has answered my question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and the Senator from Virginia will proceed.

Mr. DANIEL. The thirty days is provided in order to make it conformable to the appeal provided for on the next page of the Allison amendment. On the next page it says:

> An appeal may be taken from any interlocutory order or decree granting or continuing an injunction in any suit, but shall lie only to the Supreme Court of the United States: Provided further, That the appeal must be taken within thirty days from the entry of such order or decree, and it shall take precedence in the appellate court over all other causes, except causes of like character and criminal causes.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. DANIEL. The answer that the Senator from Iowa would make and which the Senate will probably make by adopting that provision, if it has not already done so, and which I make——

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. DANIEL. I do not yield for the moment, until I am through with the sentence.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia declines to yield.

Mr. DANIEL. The object of all of these amendments is simply to prevent delay. The Senator from Iowa proposes to prevent delay as to an appeal from the circuit court to the Supreme Court, and so, conformable to that, it is proposed in this amendment to prevent delay in exactly the same kind of suits by providing the same time as to the introduction of a bill to bring the procedure of the Interstate Commerce Commission into court; and that is the whole matter.

Mr. ALDRICH. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. I offer the amendment which has already been read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama proposes an amendment, which has already been read.

The amendment of Mr. MORGAN was to insert as an additional section the following:

SEC. —. That if the matters involved in any order or requirement of said Commission are founded upon a controversy requiring a trial by jury, as provided by the seventh amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and any such common carrier shall violate or refuse or neglect to obey or perform the same, after notice given by said Commission as provided in the fifteenth section of the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, as the same is amended by act of Congress approved March 2, 1889, it shall be lawful for any company or person interested in such order or requirement to apply in a summary way by petition to the circuit court of the United States sitting as a court of law in the judicial district in which the carrier complained of has its principal office, or in which the violation or disobedience of such order or requirement shall happen, alleging such violation or disobedience as the case may be; and said court shall by its order fix a time and place for the trial of said cause, which shall not be less than twenty nor more than forty days from the time said order is made; and it shall be the duty of the marshal of the district in which said proceeding is pending to forthwith serve a copy of said petition and of said order upon each of the defendants, and it shall be the duty of the defendants to file their answers to said petition within ten days after the service of the same as aforesaid. At the trial the findings of fact of said Commission, as set forth in its report, shall be prima facie evidence of the matters therein stated, and if either party shall demand a jury or shall omit to waive a jury the court shall, by its order, direct the marshal forthwith to summon a jury to try the cause; but if all the parties shall waive a jury in writing then the court shall try the issues in said cause and render its judgment thereon. Either party may appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States under the same regulations now provided by law in respect to security for such appeal and without regard to the value of the subject in dispute; but such appeal must be taken within twenty days from the day of the rendition of the judgment of said circuit court. If the judgment of the circuit court shall be in favor of the party complaining, he or they shall be entitled to recover a reasonable counsel or attorney's fee, to be fixed by the court, which shall be collected as part of the costs in the case. For the purposes of this act, excepting its penal provisions, the circuit courts of the United States shall be deemed to be always in session.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to give notice that in the Senate I will ask for a yea-and-nay vote on the amendment just voted down by a vote of 4 to 7.

The reading of the bill was resumed, as follows:

SEC. 7. That section 20 of said act be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 20. That the Commission is hereby authorized to require annual reports from all common carriers subject to the provisions of this act, and from the owners of all railroads engaged in interstate commerce as defined in this act, to prescribe the manner in which such reports shall be made, and to require from such carriers specific answers to all questions upon which the Commission may need information. Such annual reports shall show in detail the amount of capital stock issued, the amounts paid therefor, and the manner of payment for the same; the dividends paid, the surplus fund, if any, and the number of stockholders; the funded and floating debts and the interest paid thereon; the cost and value of the carrier's property, franchises, and equipments; the number of employees and the salaries paid each class; the accidents to passengers, employees, and other persons, and the causes thereof; the amounts expended for improvements each year, how expended, and the character of such improvements; the earnings and receipts from each branch of business and from all sources; the operating and other expenses; the balances of profit and loss; and a complete exhibit of the financial operations of the carrier each year, including an annual balance sheet. Such reports shall also contain such information in relation to rates or regulations concerning fares or freights, or agreements, arrangements, or contracts affecting the same as the Commission may require; and the Commission may, in its discretion, for the purpose of enabling it the better to carry out the purposes of this act, prescribe a period of time within which all common carriers subject to the provisions of this act shall have, as near as may be, a uniform system of accounts, and the manner in which such accounts shall be kept.

"Said detailed reports shall contain all the required statistics for the period of twelve months ending on the 30th day of June in each year, and shall be made out under oath and filed with the Commission, at its office in Washington, on or before the 30th day of September then next following, unless additional time be granted in any case by the Commission; and if any carrier, person, or corporation subject to the provisions of this act shall fail to make and file said annual reports within the time above specified, or within the time extended by the Commission for making and filing the same, or shall fail to make specific answer to any question authorized by the provisions of this section within thirty days from the time it is lawfully required so to do, such parties shall forfeit to the United States the sum of $100 for each and every day it shall continue to be in default with respect thereto. The Commission shall also have authority to require said carriers to file monthly reports of earnings and expenses or special reports within a specified period, and if any such carrier shall fail to file such reports within the time fixed by the Commission it shall be subject to the forfeitures last above provided.

"Said forfeitures shall be recovered in the manner provided for the recovery of forfeitures under the provisions of this act.

"The oath required by this section may be taken before any person authorized to administer an oath by the laws of the State in which the same is taken.

"The Commission may, in its discretion, prescribe the forms of any and all accounts, records, and memoranda to be kept by carriers subject to the provisions of this act, including the accounts, records, and memoranda of the movement of traffic as well as the receipts and expenditures of moneys. The Commission shall at all times have access to all accounts, records, and memoranda kept by carriers subject to this act, and it shall be unlawful for such carriers to keep any other accounts, records, or memoranda than those prescribed or approved by the Commission, and it may employ special agents or examiners, who shall have authority under the order of the Commission to inspect and examine any and all accounts, records, and memoranda kept by such carriers. This provision shall apply to receivers of carriers and operating trustees.

"In case of failure or refusal on the part of any such carrier, receiver, or trustee to keep such accounts, records, and memoranda on the books and in the manner prescribed by the Commission, or to submit such accounts, records, and memoranda as are kept to the inspection of the Commission or any of its authorized agents or examiners, such carrier, receiver, or trustee shall forfeit to the United States the sum of $500 for each such offense and for each and every day of the continuance of such offense, such forfeitures to be recoverable in the same manner as other forfeitures provided for in this act.

"Any person who shall willfully make any false entry in the accounts of any book of accounts or in any record or memoranda kept by a carrier, or who shall willfully destroy, mutilate, alter, or by any other means or device falsify the record of any such account, record, or memoranda, or who shall willfully neglect or fail to make full, true, and correct entries in such accounts, records, or memoranda of all facts and transactions appertaining to the carrier's business, or shall keep any other accounts, records, or memoranda than those prescribed or approved by the Commission, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be subject, upon conviction in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, to a fine of not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000, or imprisonment for a term not less than one year nor more than three years, or both such fine and imprisonment.

"Any examiner who divulges any fact or information which may come to his knowledge during the course of such examination, except in so far as he may be directed by the Commission or by a court or judge thereof, shall be subject, upon conviction in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, to a fine of not more than $5,000 or imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years, or both.

"That the circuit and district courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction, upon the application of the Attorney-General of the United States at the request of the Commission, alleging a failure to comply with or a violation of any of the provisions of said act to regulate commerce or of any act supplementary thereto or amendatory thereof by any common carrier, to issue a writ or writs of mandamus commanding such common carrier to comply with the provisions of said acts, or any of them.

"And to carry out and give effect to the provisions of said acts, or any of them, the Commission is hereby authorized to employ special agents or examiners who shall have power to administer oaths, examine witnesses, and receive evidence."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, to follow——

Mr. GALLINGER. While the Senator from Wisconsin is getting his amendment ready, I should like to ask a question, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should like to ask some Senator—I do not see present the Senator who is in charge of the bill—precisely what is meant in lines 21, 22, and 23, on page 22:

And it shall be unlawful for such carriers to keep any other accounts, records, or memoranda than those prescribed or approved by the Commission.

Does it mean that the president of a railroad corporation, for instance, shall not make an entry of any kind relating to the business of the corporation except such as is entered in the books that the Commission prescribes? I do not know what the grievance is in this direction, but it seems to me that is a very far-reaching provision. Perhaps the Senator from Rhode Island can answer it, or the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. DOLLIVER. The object of that provision is to secure uniformity and publicity in railway accounts, and the requirement is that certain accounts shall be kept, approved, and prescribed by the Interstate Commerce Commission. Now, the question which the Senator from New Hampshire raises is whether additional accounts——

Mr. GALLINGER. Or memoranda.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Or memoranda should be kept——

Mr. GALLINGER. May be kept.

Mr. DOLLIVER. May be kept; whether secret accounts, for example, may be kept. I believe the provision is an excellent one, although I can imagine a case where a railway might desire to have a more elaborate system of accounts for the guidance of its own business than the one that would be prescribed as a uniform system of railroad accounting for the whole country. It is possible there would be no objection to that, provided all the accounts which were actually kept by the railroad company were open to the same inspection that is provided for in this section.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. GALLINGER. I will yield to the Senator, because I am seeking light on this matter.

Mr. HOPKINS. I think the reading of the language of the bill itself is an answer to the Senator from New Hampshire. This only touches the books that are kept by the corporation. I think under a proper construction of this language the president of the company or the secretary or any other officer of the company could keep any book or books he saw fit to keep relating to his particular department that does not deal with the general affairs of the corporation; and it would not be illegal to keep them. But, as stated by the Senator from Iowa, the purpose of this section, from the reading, seems to be to have entire uniformity in the bookkeeping of all the different railroads of the country.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I fully agree with the Senator that it is an exceedingly desirable thing to have done to have uniform books, so far as the business of the corporation is concerned, and have them subject to examination; but it does seem to me that the provision, which is followed by severe penalties, is a very drastic one:

And it shall be unlawful for such carriers to keep any other accounts, records, or memoranda than those prescribed or approved by the Commission.

Mr. HOPKINS. I think, if the Senator will allow me, that language relates entirely to the corporation. The corporation——

Mr. ALDRICH. It does not say so.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; it does not say so.

Mr. HOPKINS. It says "carriers."

Mr. ALDRICH. It says "any person."

Mr. GALLINGER. No; it does not.

Mr. HOPKINS. The carrier is the corporation. If an officer, for his own convenience, keeps a book or set of books that has no relation to this clause here. But every item relating to the corporation or to the carrier must be recorded in the books of the corporation. If the officer has some relation to the company or to somebody else, it is not covered by this section.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, is there an amendment pending?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is not.

Mr. ALDRICH. I was about to offer an amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move to strike out those words.

Mr. FRYE. Then this debate is out of order.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is out of order, as most of the discussion has been. I move to strike out the words:

And it shall be unlawful for such carriers to keep any other accounts, records, or memoranda than those prescribed or approved by the Commission.

I make that motion simply for the purpose of having this matter explained.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have been trying to get the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire to suggest an amendment to which I think he will consent. It is to insert after the word "Commission," in the twenty-fourth line of the printed bill, page 23, "unless the same are kept open to the inspection herein provided." That simply makes them subject to inspection, which, I suppose, is all anyone could ask. Does not that answer the objection of the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. GALLINGER. I think that is——

Mr. FORAKER. There is another difficulty about this matter that suggests itself to my mind. Nearly all of these carriers are corporations incorporated under the laws of different States We have authority to legislate with respect to them only because they are engaged in interstate commerce, and only to the extent that they are engaged in interstate commerce. To that extent we have a right, of course, to exercise the power of visitation, to examine their books, and to supervise their business in all its details. But inasmuch as all these carriers so incorporated and so engaged in interstate commerce are also engaged in intrastate commerce, with which we have not anything to do, I do not believe we have the power, except only for statistical purposes, perhaps, to superintend the bookkeeping and exercise the power of visitation with respect to their accounts.

I suggest to the Senator who offers this amendment, if I may be told who he is (I was out of the Chamber when it was offered), that this should be carefully looked after before we act upon it.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggested an amendment which I thought would cover the objection of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FORAKER. I came in just as the discussion was proceeding, and I thought the discussion was upon an amendment made to the bill as it was sent to us.

Mr. DRYDEN and Mr. GALLINGER addressed the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. FRYE. We had better have the amendment before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio was entitled to the floor by the courtesy of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. FORAKER. I am entitled to the floor, and I supposed there was an amendment pending to the text of the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is an amendment pending, I will say to the Senator, and it was offered by me for the purpose of discussing the bill under the rules, the Senator from Maine having raised an objection to some inquiries that I made. I moved to strike out, on page 22, in lines 21, 22, and 23, the words:

And it shall be unlawful for such carriers to keep any other accounts, records, or memoranda than those prescribed or approved by the Commission.

I will say to the Senator from Ohio before he proceeds that my own impression was that it might not be desirable to strike out those words, but they ought to be qualified in some way. The Senator from Rhode Island suggested on page 23, line 24, after the word "Commission" it might be well to insert the words "unless the same be kept open to the inspection herein provided for." Possibly that might cure the objection that I see to the provision.

Mr. FORAKER. If I understand it, I think both the suggested amendments are proper amendments; but still they do not go as far as I think we should go. I think there should be an amendment to this amendment to the effect that this power of visitation is to be exercised with respect to interstate commerce. If we undertake to exercise it with respect to purely State commerce, the intrastate commerce, we go entirely beyond the power of Congress, and put the bill in jeopardy unnecessarily.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. Can the Senator from Ohio conceive of any method of bookkeeping by which the business of the railroads, intrastate and interstate, could be separated? All classes of business are received every day, in the same office, by the same agent, and entered on the same set of books, right on through. They would not undertake to divide the two. But I will point to the Senator that in the paragraph beginning on line 14 the words occur: "The Commission may, in its discretion, prescribe the forms of any and all accounts, records, and memoranda to be kept by carriers subject to the provisions of this act." It does not say a word about a carrier who is engaged in intrastate commerce alone. Therefore I can not see any force in the Senator's objection. The bill, as we now have it, or are trying to get it, does not require any books in regard to intrastate commerce. It deals only with carriers subject to this act, and those are the interstate-commerce railroads.

Mr. FORAKER. I was going to suggest to the Senator that there is difficulty about keeping them separate, and the carriers may not see fit because of that difficulty to undertake to keep the accounts separate. But there is no difficulty whatever about the legislation that we should enact, because the limitations of our power are well known and recognized.

Mr. TILLMAN. And they are put here.

Mr. FORAKER. If we require that they shall keep only such books as the Interstate Commerce Commissioners may prescribe they shall keep with respect to interstate commerce, and they want to mingle the accounts, that is their own affair. If they want to go to the trouble to keep a separate set of books that also is their affair, and we need not be concerned about it.

But the only point I want to make is what I have already made, namely, to call the attention of those having the bill in charge to the fact that I think it is open to that criticism as the text now stands, and I think it ought to be made to appear in the text of the law we enact that we are all the while legislating about interstate commerce, and that we are not seeking to go beyond what properly falls to us to legislate about.

Mr. FULTON. May I ask the Senator from Ohio a question?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. FULTON. I ask the Senator if he does not think that as a condition on which they may engage in interstate commerce, Congress may require them to keep all of their books in reference to carrying subject to inspection by the agents of the Government? May not Congress require that as a condition on which they are permitted to enter into interstate commerce?

Mr. FORAKER. There is great force in that. It may be that the Senator is right about that. I think, however, we could easily avoid any trouble about it by putting in the limitation I have suggested; but I do not want to press it.

Mr. DRYDEN. Mr. President, it is very evident that it is important that books of a uniform character should be kept by these railroads for the intelligent and efficient discharge of the duties of the Interstate Commerce Commission. I think there can be no dispute about that. But it can be easily seen that the officers will find it necessary from time to time to have books of their own for the discharge of their own official duties, which would be of such a character that the Interstate Commerce Commission would not feel it necessary to prescribe such forms for the use of the carriers generally. They would differ with each particular road.

When an officer goes out upon his road to inspect his property he takes his stenographer, his private secretary, or perhaps his directors along with him to examine into the needs of the road, to ascertain and explain the condition of the road. He will, of necessity, require a different set of books from those that the Commission would be likely to prescribe for the general use of the railroad, and he ought to have that privilege. What he does, he does not as an individual, but as an officer of the road, and therefore he acts for the road.

I think that no set of books which he keeps in his official capacity should be withheld from the inspection of the Commission if they desire to examine them, but he should not be tied down to a set of books which the Commission would be likely to prescribe for the use of roads generally when it would be absolutely necessary for him to have a peculiar set of books responding to the demands of his own particular property.

Mr. NELSON. This is a very important question, Mr. President. It goes to the one question of rebates and secret preferences. If carriers grant rebates and secret preferences—and it is conceded they do and still persist in it—they will be careful not to put it on their regular books; they will keep a private set of books.

With reference to the objection made by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. DRYDEN], I wish to reiterate what the Senator from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] stated a moment ago, that these books of accounts are the books of the carrier—the corporation—and it does not interfere in the least with the officers of the road when they are out doing their work and keeping their own private memoranda. These are the books of account to show the business of the carrier.

In reference to the objection made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] I want to say that, in the first place, you can not well segregate, as the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] has pointed out, from day to day the interstate business and the local business. In the next place, in connection with enforcing a regulation of interstate commerce, we have a right to impose this condition, and in order to make it effective not only to know what their interstate traffic is, but also what their local traffic is.

Mr. DRYDEN. May I ask the Senator from Minnesota a question?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. DRYDEN. I ask the Senator from Minnesota if he does not understand from this provision in the bill that it absolutely prohibits any officer of the road in his official capacity from keeping not only any set of books, but any memoranda relating to the business?

Mr. NELSON. Not at all. I do not understand it that way. This simply refers to the books of account of the corporation. The phrase "carrier" there refers to the corporation and does not refer to the agents, officers, or employees of the corporation. Unless you want to qualify this matter of rebate you do not want to tamper with that provision of the bill as passed by the House. It ought to be left as it is. It does not interfere with officers keeping private memoranda for their own use; but all the corporate transactions, all the books of account of the carrier, ought to be under one uniform system, as provided for in the bill. To emasculate that part of it is to open a door again for secret rebates. It is to allow the carriers to keep a set of books in their dealings with reference to those customers like the Standard Oil and other concerns that are accustomed to get rebates from day to day.

Mr. DRYDEN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. DRYDEN. I will ask the Senator whether if the president of the railroad or his secretary keeps a memoranda of the business of his railroad for his use as such officer, if that is not the memoranda of the corporation?

Mr. NELSON. No, sir; it is his own private memoranda. We all know——

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. I call the attention of the Senator from Minnesota to the fact that under the Elkins Act as it was reenacted the other day in the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] it is provided that—

> In construing and enforcing the provisions of this section, the act, omission, or failure of any officer, agent, or other person acting for or employed by any common carrier or shipper, acting within the scope of his employment, shall in every case be also deemed to be the act, omission, or failure of such carrier or shipper, as well as that of the person.

So if any officer of a railroad company should make a memorandum relative to the business of the railroad company under the terms of the Elkins law as it stood before this amendment, and it is repeated in this amendment, it is conclusively presumed to be the act of the carrier.

Mr. NELSON. No; it is not. Mr. President, I differ entirely with the Senator. It is where the officer acts on behalf of the corporation in keeping the books of account with shippers. It relates to their transactions with shippers and their dealings in that way. Where they keep accounts of those transactions they must all be accounts such as are provided for in the bill. That does not relate to private memorandum. The object of that clause is simply that if the officers of the corporation, their bookkeepers or their managing officers, direct the accounts of the corporation to be kept in such and such manner, that act is to be deemed the act of the corporation, and they are to be deemed liable. To illustrate, if the secretary of a corporation directs a subordinate or a clerk, in entering and making up the accounts of the corporation, to conceal or hide a part of the rebate business and keep it out of the accounts, that act is to be deemed the act of the corporation. But if, as that officer goes about his business he has a little pocketbook in his coat and pulls it out and makes a little private memorandum as to what takes place and afterwards gives the facts to the bookkeeper of the corporation, the provision does not affect that. It is only when an officer, or a clerk, or a secretary, or a manager of a corporation gives directions to in any way tamper or change or mislead in the accounts of the corporation that the act is to be deemed the act of the corporation.

I want to say again to Senators if you tamper with that provision of the bill as passed by the House, you will open another door for fraud by these carriers, if they are disposed to keep secret rebates, to keep one set of books showing the rebates and their dealings with their favorite customers, while they keep another book for the public and for the interstate commerce. It is to prevent that, it is to prevent these carriers from keeping secret books showing their rebates and their dealings with their favorite customers that this provision was put into the bill, and it ought to be retained.

Mr. FORAKER. Before the Senator takes his seat I should like to ask him—and he does not want to accomplish the purpose he expresses any more than I do—would it be objectionable to insert at the end of the paragraph:

> Provided, That this section shall not apply to the private accounts, records, or memoranda of officers, agents, or other employees.

Mr. NELSON. As long as they do not concern any rebates, add that proviso to it.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President, I desire to make a suggestion in answer to the Senator from Ohio. That amendment is entirely unnecessary, because the Commission may not require the officers of the different roads to have uniform books, and unless they do they can have just such memorandum books as they choose. I think it would be better to leave the text as it is in the bill.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, in order to put a stop to the evil of rebates it is necessary that prosecutions under the law should be successful, and in order that prosecutions should be successful it is necessary to have the evidence. This clause is the principal protection of the Government in bringing any prosecution under this act. I regard this clause as one of the most important and operative in the bill to cure what I think is the only very real evil that we have to deal with. It is the purpose of it to get rid of secret accounts and to enable the Government officials to see all of the accounts of the road. I should be very sorry to see any part of the provision stricken out.

It does not seem to me that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] would injure the paragraph or hurt the effect which is sought to be attained. I agree with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] that it is extremely important to keep this section substantially as it is. I think it is about the most important section in the entire bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Massachusetts will permit me. Does the Senator from Massachusetts agree with the Senator from Minnesota?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire has already spoken.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am asking a question.

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator for a question.

Mr. GALLINGER. That has never been denied, so far as I know.

Mr. LODGE. I yield with pleasure, of course.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts had yielded the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask him to retake it.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was about to ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether he agrees with the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Minnesota that this inhibition applies only to the corporation and not to the officials of the corporation?

Mr. LODGE. I take it it applies only to the accounts of the carrier. I do not suppose the private personal accounts of the president of a road have anything to do with it. It applies to the accounts which have anything to do with the business of the carrier.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I also regard it as very important that a rule should be prescribed by the Interstate Commerce Commission to prevent the keeping of secret accounts showing rebates, preferences, and other things forbidden by law.

But the question presented by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] is one of power, and that is whether the Congress of the United States, acting under the granted power of the Constitution relating to the regulation of interstate commerce, can prescribe to a State corporation what the general form of its books and accounts shall be. His contention is that the regulation of Congress can only be applied to these books which relate to interstate commerce. He contends, I believe, that the language here is broad enough to cover all the books and accounts kept by a State corporation, whether they relate to State commerce or to interstate commerce.

Mr. President, I do not intend to enter into that inquiry. I wish simply to state the proposition in order to present to the Senate another proposition, and that is that we will never adequately regulate carriers engaged in interstate commerce until the nation itself creates the corporations that are to do the nation's business. If the nation creates the corporation, it can then prescribe the forms of its books of account, whether that corporation engages in State or interstate commerce, for the corporation then will be the creation of the national sovereignty and the nation itself can prescribe any rule whatever regulating that corporation in its practices.

I do not wish to enter extensively into this subject. I have prepared an amendment to the bill providing for the incorporation of carriers engaged in interstate commerce by the nation. I simply wish to call the attention of Congress to the fact that we can never adequately regulate common carriers engaged in interstate commerce in the important matters relating to the keeping of their books and the important matter relating to over-capitalization and the important matter as to the rule that shall be prescribed for taxation with a view to making it uniform throughout the United States and in important matters as to the relation of such carriers to their employers and to the public unless Congress passes an act for national incorporation.

Mr. CLAY obtained the floor.

Mr. MALLORY. I ask that the pending amendment be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The SECRETARY. On page 22, line 21, after the word "act," strike out the following:

> And it shall be unlawful for such carriers to keep any other accounts, records, or memoranda than those prescribed or approved by the Commission.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, just a word. The Senator from New Hampshire is usually correct in what he attempts to do, but, in my opinion, in this instance he is not correct.

The object and purpose of this bill as it came from the House was to give the public the privilege of examining into the transactions of corporations that nothing may be kept from the public, and if you permit a corporation to keep a private book, whereby it can enter rebates and subscriptions to campaigns, it will practically destroy this bill.

Now, what will be the effect if a corporation desires to charge rebates, desires to give a favor to one shipper as against another in order to avoid the law? This favor given to one citizen over another will be recorded in the private book, and the public will never know anything about it.

Mr. President, again, if the corporation wishes to subscribe to the municipal, a State, or a national campaign and use the funds of the stockholders for the purpose of carrying on a campaign and paying the expense of it, those subscriptions will be entered in the private book, and the public will never know anything about it. The object and purpose of the House bill was to have the Commission prescribe the form of accounts to be kept by the corporations. This was to be the only form of accounts kept by the corporation, and the public, through examiners, was to know everything that transpired in the transaction of the business of the corporation.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am not going to enter into any controversy over this matter, but if contributions are made by a corporation and recorded in a private book must that not appear in the books of the corporation in some form or other, under some heading?

Mr. CLAY. Not necessarily. If the Senator—and doubtless he has done so—will critically examine the report of the Industrial Commission appointed to examine into the condition of corporations and to report to this body, he will find that most of the rebates that were granted were not kept on the regular books of the corporations, but they were simply private memoranda.

Mr. GALLINGER. I agree to that, so far as rebates are concerned, but I had reference to the abstraction of money from the treasury of the corporation. That must appear in some form or other, probably under the head of "Legal fees," for instance.

Mr. CLAY. Yes; that is true. I will say to the Senator that I have seen where donations have been made by corporations to campaigns—and I have no reference to any particular party—they have been made and entered under the head of "Legal fees."

Mr. GALLINGER. Now, Mr. President, just one word further. I thank the Senator for the suggestion he made concerning me a moment ago, and I will say to the Senator—possibly he was not in the Chamber—that I raised the question concerning this matter, thinking that it might be desirable in some way to amend it, calling attention to the fact that the keeping of a memorandum is forbidden, which, it seemed to me, went a long distance. It has been insisted by certain Senators—and the Chair will pardon me for a moment—that this relates to the corporation itself, to the carrier, and not to the officials of the road. My purpose was to withdraw my motion to strike out those words, which I shall do when the Senator from Georgia gets through; but in the hope——

Mr. CLAY. I beg to say to the Senator that there is nothing I would rather see than to have this bill completed, and I have no desire to speak. If the Senator intends to withdraw his amendment, I have nothing further to say.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do this in the hope that before the bill gets into the Senate Senators will think this matter over and see if some amendment might not be made to these words. Mr. President, I withdraw the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire withdraws the amendment.

Mr. ALDRICH. I move to modify the amendment of which I gave notice. In the twenty-third line on page 23, after the word "memoranda," I move to insert the words "relating to the business of the carrier."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island as modified.

The SECRETARY. After the word "memoranda," line 23, page 23, insert the words "relating to the business of the carrier."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment just read. [Putting the question.] The ayes have it and the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. BACON. What amendment is that?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It was proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island to insert in line 23, on page 23, after the word "memoranda," the words "relating to the business of the carrier."

Mr. TILLMAN. It seems to me that the Senator from Rhode Island is trying to annul by this amendment the provision over here that no books shall be kept other than those prescribed the Commission. By inserting those words permission is granted to keep other memoranda, provided they do not relate to the business of the carrier. How could that be done?

Mr. ALDRICH. We certainly can not provide that a man shall keep no private memoranda of his own business.

Mr. TILLMAN. If a man keeps private memoranda of his own business, he has no business with this public carrier.

Mr. ALDRICH. In regard to his own affairs?

Mr. TILLMAN. It is not his own affair. The corporation is a public carrier transacting public business.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is exactly what I am trying to put into this bill.

Mr. TILLMAN. Do not let us mix them up. Let us not put it in at all.

Mr. ALDRICH. It seems to me absolutely necessary that it should go in, if you want to have the bill mean what you say it means.

Mr. TILLMAN. If I understand the language of the bill, it means that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall prescribe the character of books and memoranda and all that kind of thing. Now, the Senator goes over here and at the tail proposes to provide that the memoranda shall relate to such public carrier's business. It is either surplusage or else it is a contradiction.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I think I must decline to yield further to the Senator.

Mr. TILLMAN. Perhaps the Senator can explain it in a satisfactory way.

Mr. ALDRICH. I will try to do so. I think I can, even to his apprehension. The language as now used in the bill is:

Or shall keep any other accounts—

Mind you, the disjunctive "or"—

Or shall keep any other accounts, records, or memoranda than those prescribed or approved by the Commission.

At the beginning of the clause it says "any person." Apparently that means that no man can keep any other accounts except those approved by this Commission, whether connected with the business of the carrier or not. Certainly it is not the intention of Congress to go into everybody's business and to provide that they shall not keep any accounts except such as are approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission. If the language is open to that construction, as it seems to me very plain that it is, then Congress certainly ought not to adopt a law that would be simply ridiculous on its face. What I want to do, is to provide that no person shall keep any accounts, memoranda, or records pertaining to the business of any carrier that are not open to the inspection of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and that, if he does so, he must be subject to the penalties of this proposed act.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the Senator from Rhode Island permit me?

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. I think the words "accounts, records, or memoranda" read by him relate to the words in the earlier part of the paragraph.

Mr. ALDRICH. They certainly ought not to be used.

Mr. HOPKINS. I think so.

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly not.

Mr. HOPKINS. Because the "memoranda" may be a different method of keeping accounts.

Mr. ALDRICH. If the Senator will permit me—I do not yield for an argument—the word "or" disjoins this part of the sentence from the remainder of the sentence in this clause. Clearly, in my mind, it makes it a misdemeanor for any person, without any regard to his business, whether it be a corporation or a carrier, to keep memoranda that are not approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission. The language is certainly open to that construction. I want to make it clear. Neither the Senator from Illinois nor any other Senator would undertake to say that he desires to make the keeping of any other accounts, except such accounts as pertain to the business of a common carrier, subject to the approval of the Commission.

Mr. HOPKINS. If the Senator will allow me, the trouble, it seems to me, all arises from the fact that there would be a question between the carrier and the Interstate Commerce Commission as to whether its books related to the exception the Senator proposes; and to avoid such a controversy, I think the language should be retained.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator from Illinois seriously think that a man ought to be subjected to a fine and imprisonment upon a question of that kind? If it were the business of the carrier, the man would be punished; and, if it were not the business of the carrier, he ought not to be punished.

Mr. DRYDEN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. DRYDEN]?

Mr. ALDRICH. I yield the floor entirely, Mr. President.

Mr. DRYDEN. Mr. President, I am in favor of having uniform books kept by the different carriers, which will, of course, be open at all times to the inspection of the Interstate Commerce Commission. I am in favor of providing that any books which an officer of a company in his official capacity keeps relating to the business of his company, and that any memoranda which an officer of a company as such keeps relating to the business of the company, shall be open to the inspection of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The importance of having uniform books in order that the Interstate Commerce Commission can perform their duties intelligently is so obvious that I suppose that it will not be denied or disputed by anybody.

In my judgment, the evil of the provision we are now considering lies right here: That no officer of a carrier company can keep a book or a memorandum relating to his business without first having it approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission. I think that is not necessary and that it will serve no useful purpose, because the claim that these books or memoranda can be used to conceal rebates or for other vicious purposes has no foundation in fact. If the Interstate Commerce Commission prescribes books for keeping records of the transactions of these great corporations, it can prescribe forms of books and data which will bring out every single transaction of the company.

The point that I make is that any memoranda, any data, any book kept by an officer of a company in his official capacity for his purposes and uses as such officer is a book of the corporation. That is the very thing which is denied him by this provision of the proposed law. Could an officer of a company going over the road take along with him the immense ledgers and books which are kept at the home office of the company for the uses of the corporation there, and, if he could take them along, could he do it without interfering with the business of his corporation? Are not those books required at the head office of the company to record the daily transactions of the company? What is going to be done in the way of recording those transctions when the books are away?

I say that this amendment will tie up the business of the road and unnecessarily and improperly cramp the officers of the company in the discharge of their duties.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. HOPKINS. Before the Senator from New Jersey takes his seat I desire to ask him a question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. DRYDEN] has yielded the floor, and the Chair has recognized the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. TILLMAN. I will yield to the Senator from Illinois, if he wishes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina yields to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. HOPKINS. I only desire to put a question to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. TILLMAN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HOPKINS. I should like to know from the Senator from New Jersey what kind of a book or set of books does he think the division superintendent of a railroad would keep in going out over his division or the general manager would keep in going over the line of the road?

Mr. DRYDEN. If he wishes to act intelligently, he must carry with him a transcript from the official records of the company.

Mr. HOPKINS. Of what character?

Mr. DRYDEN. Of any character that may be necessary to enable him intelligently and properly to investigate the particular subject he may have under consideration.

Mr. HOPKINS. If the Senator will allow me, the division superintendent goes out from Chicago, for example, over his division in the morning and back at night. He makes his inspection during the day. If there is anything on that inspection that should go upon the books of the company, when he returns at night original entries are made respecting the work of the day. Any private memoranda that he might make in the course of his trip during the day is no part of the books of the company, but is simply to aid his memory during the day, so that when he returns to the office such matters as should go upon the books of the company can be properly transcribed.

Mr. DRYDEN. Yes.

Mr. HOPKINS. If this bill is left as it is provided in the paragraph before us, no harm can come to a division superintendent under these conditions; but if they are permitted to have another set of books, I can see where trouble might arise.

Mr. ALDRICH. I withdraw the amendment, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin will be stated.

The Secretary proceeded to read the proposed amendment of Mr. LA FOLLETTE, which appears on page 139 of the pamphlet amendments.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. There is much confusion on the floor, and, as the amendments which I offer seem to be waited for by some Republican colleagues with motions to lay upon the table, I should like to have order at least when the amendments are read, so that they may be understood when voted upon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator please indicate on what page of the pamphlet amendments his amendment comes in?

The SECRETARY. On page 139.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will ask that the amendment be again read from the beginning, as there has been such confusion in the Chamber that I am sure not only the place where the amendment is to be inserted is not understood, but the character of the amendment itself is not understood.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will resume from the beginning the reading of the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On line 2, page 25, it is proposed to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 7a. That section 19 of said act be amended by adding thereto a new section to be known as section 19a, and to read as follows:

"SEC. 19a. The Commission shall investigate and ascertain the fair value of the property of every railroad engaged in interstate commerce, as defined in this act, and used by it for the convenience of the public. For the purpose of such investigation the Commission is authorized to employ such engineers, experts, and other assistants as may be necessary. Such investigation shall be commenced not later than July 1, 1906, and shall be prosecuted with diligence and thoroughness and the results thereof reported to Congress at the beginning of each regular session. Such valuation shall show the value of the property of every railroad as a whole, and the value of its property in each of the several States or Territories or the District of Columbia. Every such railroad shall furnish to the Commission, from time to time, and as the Commission may require, maps, profiles, contracts, reports of engineers, and other documents, records, and papers, or copies of any or all of the same, in aid of such investigation and determination of the value of the property of said railroad, and every such railroad is required to cooperate with the Commission in the work of the valuation of its property in such further particulars and to such extent as the Commission may direct.

"The Commission shall, thereafter, in like manner, keep itself informed of all extensions and improvements or other changes in the conditions of the property of the said railroads, and ascertain the fair value thereof, and from time to time, as may be required for the regulation of railways under the provisions of this act, revise and correct its valuation of railway property. To enable the Commission to make such changes and corrections in its valuation, every railroad engaged in interstate commerce, as defined in this act, is required to report currently to the Commission, and as the Commission may require, all improvements and changes in its property, and to file with the Commission copies of all contracts for such improvements at the time the same are executed.

"Whenever the Commission shall have completed the valuation of the property of any railroad, and before said valuation shall become final, the Commission shall give notice by registered letter, to the company or companies owning or operating said railroad, stating the valuation placed upon the several lines of road and classes of property of the said company, used by it for the convenience of the public, and shall allow the company or companies twenty days in which to file a protest of the same with the Commission. If no protest is filed within twenty days, such valuation shall become final.

"If notice of contest is filed by any railroad the Commission shall fix a time for hearing the same, and shall proceed as promptly as may be to hear and consider any matter relative and material thereto presented by such railroad in support of its protest so filed as aforesaid. If after hearing any contest of such valuation under the provisions of this act, the Commission is of the opinion that its valuation is incorrect, it shall make such changes as shall make the same a fair valuation of such property, and shall issue an order making such corrected valuation final. All final valuations by the Commission shall be prima facie evidence of the fair value of the railroad property in all proceedings under this act."

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine moves to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, I should like to have the Senator from Maine, if he will, withhold that motion for a moment. I am not at liberty to vote on this proposition, because I am paired, but I should like to have about a minute to state exactly how I stand on it, if the Senator does not object to my consuming so much time.

Mr. HALE. The Senator is so modest in his request, that I for a moment withhold the motion.

Mr. MONEY. I am obliged to the Senator.

Mr. President, I do not want that amendment tabled without placing myself fairly upon the record in regard to it. I believe it would be the most valuable part of this bill if it could be adopted. I do not understand how the railroad Commission can ever fix a just and reasonable rate without first ascertaining, as a basis for valuation, the value of the roads themselves; what dividends will be declared upon a certain amount invested, and what profits should accrue from certain services rendered. I do not understand how it is possible to come accurately and reasonably near the truth except by a valuation of the property and the amount of money invested. Of course, there are other circumstances that will enter into account in fixing the rate and the compensation of the carrier; but this certainly must be the basis. It is what I understand the Interstate Commerce Commission have been for years calling for, and in one decision of the Supreme Court they said it was the only means by which a fair rate could be fixed.

I desired to make these remarks simply that I might go upon the record as supporting this amendment.

Mr. HALE. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I do not know whether or not my colleague [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] desires to be heard upon this amendment. If he does for fifteen minutes, I think upon every principle which has prevailed in the Senate he is entitled to do so.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] has never shown himself incapable of asserting his own rights. He did not rise to debate the amendment, and no Senator rose for that purpose.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I beg the Senator's pardon. When he makes that statement, he evidently overlooked the fact that I had addressed the Chair at the time, with a view of having something to say, though I could not hope that the Senate would be greatly enlightened thereby.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If I may be permitted, I should like to say that before the Senator from Maine took the floor the Senator from Arkansas was on his feet to debate this amendment.

Mr. HALE. I had not perceived that.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I know that several other Senators desire to debate it.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the amendment speaks for itself. It involves in itself a very large proposition, a distinctive feature, which with all ingenuity that might be employed, Senators could not be much better impressed than by the reading of the amendment. My object was not to interfere personally with any one Senator, or another Senator, but, in accordance with what I believe to be the feeling of the Senate upon matters which the Senate understands and comprehends, when an amendment is read, for one I propose, whenever an opportunity affords, to give the Senate a chance of laying the amendment upon the table, and thereby to end it. I shall not waive this right in this case, if the Chair recognizes me, for general debate upon this matter. If the Senator from Wisconsin, who has offered the amendment, believes that he can add anything to the clear, measured language of his amendment by anything that he may say, I will withhold my motion until he has that opportunity; but I will leave that entirely to him.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I do not understand that any Senator has the right to indicate what particular Senator shall address the Senate, nor for how long, nor what he shall say about any pending matter. When the Senator from Maine withdraws his motion and turns the question over to the Senate, it will be a matter of opportunity whether or not he can be recognized a second time to make his motion; but he can not extend his motion with a string to it, and say who shall speak and who shall not. He may insist upon the decision of his motion now, or withdraw it.

Mr. HALE. I am withholding the motion only as a matter of courtesy. I said to the Senator offering the amendment that if he asked to explain it, I would, as a matter of courtesy, withhold my motion. I do not in that select him. He has selected himself. He has a right to offer the amendment. I am not invidious in any distinction; I am not seeking to interfere with the Senator from Arkansas particularly, but I think that the Senate is ready for the question.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Let the Senate be the judge of that. If the Senator makes a motion, it is before the Senate to be disposed of; if he withdraws that motion, then it is for the Senate to determine its own course of proceeding.

Mr. HALE. On the other hand, if I do not withdraw the motion, then the Senate can decide the question——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Then it is before the Senate.

Mr. HALE. If I do withdraw the motion the Senate has no opportunity, and it goes on indefinitely upon debate, which, however bright it might be, would probably not make the understanding of Senators much clearer. The Senator is not a Senator who obtrudes remarks unnecessarily; he is not one of the Senators who wastes time; I admit that. He has shown in what he has said heretofore in the Senate his capacity; I realize all that; but if I do not insist on the right of moving to lay the amendment on the table and thereby bringing the matter to an end and proceeding to other parts of the bill, there will be no end to this subject, and if I do not make the motion somebody else will.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I am not insisting that the Senator from Maine has no right to make the motion to lay upon the table. I know he has that right; but I insist that he has no right to make a motion of that sort and then withhold it, without unanimous consent, for a specific purpose. When a motion is presented to the Senate parliamentarily, it is within the control of the Senate, to be disposed of one way or another.

Mr. HALE. I am making no pretense of having a right to control that motion to allow one Senator to speak and to deny that right to another.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that this debate is out of order.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I think so.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. HALE. Well, I will ask the sense of the Senate on the motion to lay the amendment on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine moves that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] be laid on the table.

Mr. BACON. I rise to a point of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. BACON. The point of order I make is that a motion to lay an amendment on the table before the same has been discussed, or when a Senator has expressed a desire to debate it, is in violation of the unanimous-consent agreement of April 30, which declares that discussion upon amendments shall proceed under the fifteen-minute rule until discussion thereon is concluded.

The unanimous-consent agreement is in these words:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that on Friday, May 4, 1906, immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill H. R. 12987, "'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission;" the bill to be read by sections for the purpose of amendment, the discussion upon amendments offered to proceed under a fifteen-minute rule, the amendments to be disposed of when the discussion thereon is concluded.

Mr. President, I ask permission to submit very briefly the grounds upon which I base that point of order. The Senate will remark that, in the absence of this unanimous-consent rule, there would not be in order a vote upon any amendment—in other words, the discussion would be proceeding, and it would be only when the Senate came to a final vote upon the bill that the votes on the amendments would be in order. It is solely by reason of the fact that we have made this unanimous-consent agreement that, in advance of the time when the vote on the bill is in order, we are proceeding to vote upon the amendments. The original proposition, as Senators will recall, was that we should take up the amendments for discussion. That was the purpose of it—to bring Senators to a discussion upon the amendments. Subsequently, in the course of the colloquy and the debate, as will be shown by the RECORD, there was engrafted upon that the further proposition that after the amendments had been thus debated, instead of being laid aside to be voted on at the conclusion when the bill came to be voted upon, we would go outside of the ordinary routine practice—take the amendments up and vote upon them in advance of what we would otherwise do.

So that, Mr. President, the question of order is to be considered, not with reference to the regular rule of the right to move to lay upon the table at any time, but to be taken with reference solely and exclusively to the terms of the unanimous-consent order, because it is only by the unanimous-consent order that any vote is in order at all, and according to the terms of the unanimous-consent order a vote is only in order after an opportunity for discussion——

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. Now, I do not mean to say, if the Senator will pardon me a minute——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia declines to yield.

Mr. BACON. I do not mean to say, Mr. President, that that means that there is no time at which the Senate would claim to itself the right to determine the debate on an amendment by a motion to lay upon the table, but I do say that after Senators, in consideration of the opportunity furnished by the rule to debate amendments, agreed upon it, that there could be a vote upon such an amendment prior to the ordinary time of the debate, it would be a great breach of faith——

Mr. ALDRICH. I think I must rise to a point of order.

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator will pardon me.

Mr. ALDRICH. I withhold it for a moment, but the Senator is clearly out of order.

Mr. BACON. I am not out of order. I am proceeding with the consent of the Chair. I got the consent of the Chair before I began.

Mr. ALDRICH. Did the Senator get the consent of the Senate?

Mr. BACON. No; the consent of the Chair.

Mr. ALDRICH. I wish to make the point of order that the Senator is proceeding out of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the opinion that the Senator can proceed only by the consent of the Senate.

Mr. BACON. If the Chair will pardon a suggestion, the Chair is called upon to rule upon a point of order, and it is certainly competent for the Chair to ask that the Senator making the point of order give his view to the Chair in order that the Chair may determine it.

Mr. ALDRICH. My point of order is——

Mr. BACON. I therefore asked the consent of the Chair before I begun.

Mr. ALDRICH. My point is that pending a question which is not debatable there is no debate permissible upon the point of order. That has been decided here a thousand times.

Mr. BACON. It is done every day by consent.

Mr. ALDRICH. I was objecting to the Senator's proceeding further.

Mr. BACON. I was proceeding by the consent of the Chair, as I understood; not by the consent of the Senator from Rhode Island. I will simply state that if Senators violate the consent agreement they need not expect any more unanimous-consent agreements.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the opinion that this question was settled by the Senate in its interpretation of this very rule on the 8th instant. The Chair is of the opinion that the motion to lay on the table is in order. The question is on agreeing to the motion to lay on the table.

The motion was rejected.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I have but little to say in support of this amendment. If the interruption had not occurred, I would have been through long since.

Many amendments have been presented here about which there existed room for differences of opinion among those who favor a law upon the general subject of the regulation of railroad rates. This is an amendment——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas will suspend until the Senate is in order.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. As I was saying, many amendments have been presented, discussed, and disposed of——

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator allow me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. I rise to the only point of order I can make—that there ought to be order in the Chamber. At the little distance that I am from the Senator I can not hear a word he says. It is not his fault. It is the fault of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. As I was saying, Mr. President, many amendments have been offered for consideration in connection with the pending bill which presented different theories of regulation or different theories of disposing of some feature of the general plan of regulating railroad rates. There was room for discussion, room for differences of opinion, as to the best method of disposing of them. But this amendment is one that presents no issue between those who favor the passage of any effective bill. The only issue that could arise would be between those who favor the passage of such a measure and those who oppose the passage of any legislation whatever on the subject. It is the primary and fundamental step to be taken in any rational system of regulation. There must be an ascertainment of the value of the property to be regulated before there can be computed a just and reasonable compensation for its use. That computation must be made by some one before any step whatever can be taken in the matter of fixing rates.

The Supreme Court of the United States has fixed somewhat the limits of the authority to be delegated to those who administer this right to fix rates to be charged by common carriers, and the doctrine there declared is that the compensation to which the carrier is entitled is a just return upon the value of the property at the time the same is used in the public service. Just and reasonable return upon the value of the property is the fundamental and, as I said a moment ago, the primary step in the whole transaction. Without the ascertainment of that by some one called upon to discharge that duty, no subsequent steps can be taken intelligently.

If the rate is challenged in court, the court must provide for an ascertainment of the value before it can determine whether the rate is reasonable and just or whether it is otherwise. No single step can be taken that will amount to anything unless there has been an ascertainment of the value of the property. I do not understand that anyone pretends to the contrary, the only difference here being whether it shall be intelligently made by the Commission when that transaction forms the major purpose of the investigation, or in a mere incidental manner through the courts upon partial investigation and hearing. Of course it leaves very wide room for uncertainty in decision when undertaken as a merely incidental issue by the courts. In such controversies the proof in the particulars must govern in its decision by the court. This must depend in large degree upon the competency of counsel engaged in preparing the case for hearing, the importance attached to the issue in the particular case, and other circumstances connected with that particular case. The decision of the same fact of value of the same railway may therefore be decided differently on different hearings.

This amendment ought to commend itself to those who want clearness instead of confusion. I think there can be no objection on the part of anyone who favors the enactment of a railroad regulation law that this matter, being of such great importance, shall be taken up deliberately and shall receive the very fairest attention it is possible to provide by law. I think the carrier ought to be heard. I think the Commission ought to provide the fullest investigation, and after the fullest hearing determine the fundamental question of the value of the property. Unless that is done there will be no step taken that will amount to anything more than a guess. Before the court will be able to say whether the rate is fair and just it must have an investigation made. It may be said that in the general direction to the Commission to fix a just and reasonable rate, by implication the power to fix the value of the property employed in the service is conferred, and that that will probably follow. But I think this step is second only in importance to the fact that a rate is to be fixed, and a very full, complete, and minute direction should be given as to how it should be done, and I think it should be a preliminary step. I think we can in that way answer in a measure the suggestion of the Supreme Court and conform to the rule laid down by that tribunal. Of all the persons who should be interested in the adoption of this amendment it would seem to me that the broad court revisionists are the ones who would insist that this fundamental step should be taken and under such circumstances as to impart to the ascertainment such verity that it would not thereafter be questioned.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, as the mover of the measure has not indicated any desire to explain it, I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. With the permission of the Senator from Maine, I will submit a few remarks to the Senate.

Mr. HALE. It is not for me to permit the Senator. I stated, and I renew it, that if the Senator himself who offered the amendment desires to explain it I will not insist, until after he has left the floor, upon my motion. But I shall then make the motion and have it submitted to the Senate. I am not discriminating for or against the Senator personally. He has offered the amendment, and I am willing to withhold my motion until he, having offered the amendment, explains it under the rule as he desires. Then I shall ask recognition from the Chair for my motion.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I was not aware that any Senator upon this floor, by serving notice upon the Senate that he proposed to move to lay an amendment on the table, could foreclose all other Senators from even rising and asking for recognition to discuss the amendment. I knew that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] desired to speak upon this amendment; I know that other Senators desire to speak upon it, for they so indicated to me. For that reason I waited, after the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] took his seat, to see whether others desired to speak before I rose. Before any other Senator could secure recognition the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] interposed his motion for the purpose of preventing debate.

Mr. President, I can not be quite indifferent to the fact that the distinguished Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] has applied his motion to table the amendments so far, I believe, in the debate, which were offered by myself, with one exception, and that was the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN], which was so near akin to one I had offered that the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] doubtless felt constrained to make his motion, in that case, merely to be consistent.

Mr. President, I will say, that while I remain a member of the Senate, there will never again be unanimous consent given for the adoption of such a rule as that under which we are proceeding which does not permit a vote to be taken directly upon the amendments as a part of the unanimous-consent agreement—excluding the motion to table.

Mr. President, with respect to the amendment which is before the Senate, I have to say just this: It is the foundation of any legislation that is to be effective to secure reasonable rates that there shall be a valuation of the railroad property of this country. In support of that I call the attention of the Senate to the following language of the Supreme Court:

> The utmost that any corporation operating a public highway can rightfully demand at the hands of the legislature when exerting its general power is that it receives what, under all the circumstances, is such compensation for the use of its property as will be just both to it and to the public.

And then, Mr. President, they went on and laid down for the consideration of every legislative, administrative, or judicial body that should deal with this question, a method of ascertaining what rate would be just both to the public and to the public-service corporation, and in defining the basis upon which reasonable rates must be fixed they said this:

> If a railroad corporation has bonded its property for an amount that exceeds in its fair value, or if its capitalization is largely fictitious, it may not impose upon the public the burden of such increased rates as may be required for the purpose of realizing profits upon such excessive valuation or fictitious capitalization.

They said further:

> If a corporation can not maintain such a highway and earn dividends for stockholders, it is a misfortune for it and them, which the Constitution does not require to be remedied by imposing unjust burdens upon the public.

Now, sir, with respect to the vital importance of this valuation before any commission or any legislative or any judicial tribunal can fix a reasonable rate, I wish to call attention to the language of the Interstate Commerce Commission, submitted to this body in its report for 1903. That was quite recently; and at that time, in urging upon Congress the importance of authorizing the Commission to make a valuation of railway property, they said:

> Among the subjects which deserve the attention of Congress is the need of a trustworthy valuation of railway property.
> A large number of questions incident to the valuation of railway properties suggest themselves in addition to those which have been mentioned. This report can not, however, enter into further detail. Sufficient has been said to indicate the importance of an authoritative determination of railway values. It is respectfully recommended that Congress take this matter under advisement with a view to such legislative action as may be deemed appropriate.

They said, further, these important words with respect to the valuation of railway property:

> No tribunal upon which the duty may be imposed, whether legislative, administrative, or judicial, can pass a satisfactory judgment upon the reasonableness of railway rates without taking into account the value of railway property.

Now, what is it proposed to do by this legislation? Is it proposed to give to the people of this country reasonable rates? Will anyone contend on this floor that the public is not entitled to reasonable rates? Will anyone contend that the railroad companies, the common carriers of this country, are entitled to more than reasonable rates? If the reasonable rate is that which does justice to the public and justice to the common carrier—and if it is desired to have justice done to the public and to the carrier—then why not incorporate in this legislation the means of enabling the Commission to ascertain the reasonable rate? You have not yet done it. You will never do it until you adopt an amendment authorizing and requiring the Commission to make a valuation of the property of every railway company subject to the provisions of this act.

With respect to this proposition, the Chicago Record-Herald had this to say editorially:

> There is one feature * * * which is bound to be pressed, no matter what laws are enacted this year. That is for the valuation of railroad property. The Interstate Commerce Commission has asked the power. The convention of railroad commissioners in Washington a month ago voted unanimously in favor of it. Many States which are struggling with the assessment of railroad property would be interested in it. Whether in connection with proposals for broader rate-making legislation or entirely apart from such a movement, we are certain to hear a good deal more of it in the future.

The Chicago Tribune had this to say editorially with reference to the proposition which is now before the Senate:

> It is obvious that both the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Senator from Wisconsin are correct in affirming that no intelligent regulation of rates can be carried out without a knowledge of the real value of the physical value of the railroads. To expect that Commission to fix rates or the courts to review them without such valuation would be to repeat Pharaoh's old demand for bricks without straw. To make the proposed appraisement would cost some millions and some time, but effective public rate regulation by the Interstate Commerce Commission—such regulation as would be likely to stand the test of judicial review—implies and requires that the appraisement be made.

Now, I say to Senators here that the only justification which you can offer for a vote against this amendment is that it is not the purpose to pass a bill here to enable the Commission to institute any efficient regulation of railways or to defend in the courts the reasonableness of a single rate or regulation which it may seek to establish. But if it is the purpose to so empower the Commission, provision must be made for the valuation of railway property, because when the Commission fixes its rates and the railroad company resists those rates, the question which will be raised is whether the rates as established will yield a fair return upon the fair value of the property of the railroad company. If the rate will not yield such return it can not stand. Whether the Commission can maintain its rates or not will depend upon its ability to show in the court that the rates which they have established do yield a fair return upon the fair value of the railroad property. Clearly, it can not do this unless it knows what is the fair value of that property.

Now, I undertake to say that the bill which is before the Senate does not provide for ascertaining a reasonable rate upon the basis fixed by the Supreme Court.

It certainly does not profess to provide for fixing reasonable rates. It provides only that the Commission may fix maximum rates, but it provides no means by which the Commission can ascertain whether the rate which is fixed as a maximum is a just and reasonable maximum rate. Until the Commission is authorized to make, and does make, a true valuation of railway property, it can never make it clear to the court that the maximum rate which it establishes is a reasonable maximum rate.

I insist, Mr. President, that this is a bill for the benefit of the shipper, who does not really pay the charges. It aims only to clothe the Commission with power to ascertain whether rates are relatively equal between shippers. It provides that, upon complaint, the Commission may prescribe such rates. But the only standard of comparison by which the Commission can be guided in its effort to fix rates is the standard set by other rates made by the railroads, and the reasonableness of which is known only to the railroads.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. HALE. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] to lay on the table the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

Mr. HALE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SPOONER (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK], who is absent. If I were at liberty to vote I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. ALLISON. Has the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] voted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. ALLISON. I am paired with that Senator. If he were present I should vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 40, nays 27, as follows:

YEAS—40.

Aldrich	Cullom	Hansbrough	Millard
Alger	Dick	Hemenway	Nelson
Allee	Dillingham	Hopkins	Nixon
Ankeny	Dryden	Kean	Penrose
Brandegee	Flint	Kittredge	Perkins
Bulkeley	Foraker	Knox	Piles
Burnham	Frye	Lodge	Platt
Carter	Fulton	Long	Scott
Clark, Wyo.	Gallinger	McCumber	Sutherland
Crane	Hale	McEnery	Wetmore

NAYS—27.

Bacon	Culberson	Gearin	Overman
Bailey	Dolliver	La Follette	Simmons
Berry	Dubois	Latimer	Taliaferro
Blackburn	Elkins	McCreary	Teller
Burkett	Foster	McLaurin	Tillman
Clarke, Ark.	Frazier	Mallory	Warner
Clay	Gamble	Newlands

NOT VOTING—22.

Allison	Clark, Mont.	Money	Smoot
Beveridge	Daniel	Morgan	Spooner
Burrows	Depew	Patterson	Stone
Burton	Gorman	Pettus	Warren
Carmack	Heyburn	Proctor
Clapp	Martin	Rayner

So Mr. LA FOLLETTE's amendment was laid on the table.

Mr. FORAKER. I offer an amendment to be inserted as a separate section, following section 7, to be numbered section 8. The amendment is printed at page 191 of the larger compilation of amendments.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 191 of the printed amendments, add at the end of section 7 a new section, to be known as section 8, as follows——

Mr. FORAKER. Unless the Senate desires that the amendment be read at this time, I will state that the amendment has been read already. I made it the subject of extended remarks here some ten days ago. I will have it read or not, as Senators desire. I can explain in a very few words what the amendment is. If Senators will turn to the printed amendments on page 191, they will find the amendment there set forth. By glancing at it they will see that while the reading would require some time the new part that is proposed of the intended law is very brief. In other words, this is simply a proposition to amend section 3 of the Elkins law as it now stands. If any Senator prefers to have it read rather than simply turn to it as it appears, of course it can be read at the desk.

Mr. HALE. It is a very important amendment. I think it had better be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment submitted by the Senator from Ohio.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 8. That section 3 of the act approved February 19, 1903, entitled "An act to further regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the States," be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 3. That whenever the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have reasonable ground for belief that any common carrier is engaged in the carriage of passengers or freight traffic between given points at less than the published rates on file, or is, either singly or in cooperation with one or more carriers, publishing and charging unjust or unreasonable rates therefor, or is committing any discriminations forbidden by law, whether as between shippers, places, commodities, or otherwise, and whether effected by means of rates, rebates, classifications, preferentials, private cars, refrigerator cars, switching or terminal charges, elevator charges, failure to supply shippers equally with cars, or in any other manner whatsoever, it shall, if the complainants so request or if for any reason it prefer or deem advisable to proceed under the provisions of this section instead of under the other provisions of this act, be its duty, if such carrier or carriers will not, after due notice, desist from such violation of the law, to file with the Attorney-General a brief statement of its grounds for such belief and the evidence in support thereof, and thereupon, under his direction, and in the name of the United States, a petition shall be presented alleging such facts to the circuit court of the United States sitting in equity having jurisdiction; and when the act complained of is alleged to have been committed or as being committed in part in more than one judicial district or State, it may be dealt with, inquired of, tried, and determined in any one of such judicial districts or States, whereupon it shall be the duty of the court summarily to inquire into the facts and circumstances, upon such notice and in such manner as the court shall direct and without the formal pleadings and proceedings applicable to ordinary suits in equity, and to make such other persons or corporations parties thereto as the court may deem necessary; and upon being satisfied of the truth of the allegations of said petition said court shall enjoin, according to the ground of complaint, the publishing and charging of all of any such rate or rates so complained of in excess of what the court shall find to be reasonable and just, which shall continue to be the lawful rate as heretofore and now prescribed by statute, such injunction to continue in force during such period as the same or substantially the same conditions may continue as are established by the evidence in such case, or shall enforce an observance of the published tariffs if they are found to be just and reasonable, or direct and require a discontinuance of such discriminations by such proper orders, writs, and process as will, as nearly as may be, prohibit unlawful discriminations as to both persons and places and secure equality of right and treatment to all shippers and localities, which said orders, writs, and process may be enforceable as well against the parties interested in the traffic as against the carrier or carriers complained of; and all proceedings hereunder shall be subject to the right of appeal to the Supreme Court, as now provided by the act of February 11, 1903, to expedite the hearings of suits in equity; but such appeal shall not operate to stay or supersede the order of the court or the execution of any writ or process thereon, unless the circuit or Supreme Court, on application therefor made for good cause, so order. It shall be the duty of the several district attorneys of the United States, whenever the Attorney-General shall direct, either of his own motion or upon the request of the Interstate Commerce Commission, to institute and prosecute such proceedings, and the proceedings provided for by this act shall be prosecuted at the cost of the United States or the railroad company or companies as the court may adjudge equitable and just, and such proceedings shall not preclude the bringing of suit for the recovery of damages by any party injured or any other action provided by said act approved February 4, 1887, entitled 'An act to regulate commerce' and the acts amendatory thereof. And in proceedings under this act and the acts to regulate commerce the said courts shall have the power to compel the attendance of witnesses, both upon the part of the carrier and any shipper or shippers who may be interested, who shall be required to answer on all subjects relating directly or indirectly to the matter in controversy, and to compel the production of all books and papers, both of the carrier and the shipper or shippers, which relate directly or indirectly to such transaction. The claim that such testimony or evidence may tend to criminate the person giving such evidence shall not excuse such person from testifying or such corporation producing its books and papers, but no person shall be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he may testify or produce evidence or information, documentary or otherwise, in such proceeding: Provided, That the provisions of an act entitled 'An act to expedite the hearing and determination of suits in equity pending or hereafter brought under the act of July 2, 1890, entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies." "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, or any other acts having a like purpose that may be hereafter enacted, approved February 11, 1903,' shall apply to any case prosecuted under the direction of the Attorney-General in the name of the Interstate Commerce Commission."

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I think the bill under consideration has been greatly improved by the amendments made by the Senate. I think it was a great improvement to adopt the so-called "court-review provision." I think it was also a great improvement on the bill as passed by the House to amend it by adopting the provision which requires carriers to confine themselves after the 1st day of May, 1908, to the business of carrying alone; in order words, to require them to go out of the carrying on of other business than that which properly belongs to common carriers.

I think it was an improvement also to restore the imprisonment clause, and I think we have improved the bill further and very materially by providing penalties for shippers who ask for and receive rebates. I think the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] did a good day's work when he offered that amendment and secured its adoption.

But notwithstanding all these improvements, Mr. President, the bill which we are about to enact is yet open to some very serious objections; objections that go to the constitutionality of the measure as well as to its efficiency, if it should be upheld in the courts. In the first place, notwithstanding all we have done and all we are likely to do, the bill as it will become a law will confer upon the Interstate Commerce Commission the three independent and coordinate powers of Government—judicial power, executive power, legislative power. I do not see how the bill can be upheld in the courts with that commingling of all these powers in the Commission.

It also will, in my judgment, clearly delegate legislative power. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] in addressing the Senate a few moments ago in behalf of his amendment made a strong argument in favor of his proposition by pointing out that the bill has that deficiency. I understood him to go so far as to express the opinion that if the amendment he was then discussing should not be adopted the standard of just and reasonable by which the Commission is to determine rates will remain so indefinite as to be no standard at all, practically.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the junior Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. FORAKER. I do, simply for a question. I am limited as to my time.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I wish merely to state that I did not mean to say what the Senator represented me as saying. I simply mean to say that it does not afford any means for the Commission to ascertain whether the rate is reasonable or not.

Mr. FORAKER. I may not have correctly understood the Senator. But I do not understand that his explanation changes the effect of what he said. I understood him to be of the opinion that the fixing of rates would be a matter of judgment, without any definite standard, and therefore the legislative power would be delegated. But whether that was his opinion or not, it is clearly my opinion.

In addition to that, Mr. President—I have only time to enumerate them, not to discuss them—the bill will still be liable to the constitutional difficulty I argued at length on a previous day in this debate of fixing through routes and joint rates in such a way as to have the legal effect of taking private property without just compensation, and it will be, in my opinion, unconstitutional on that account.

There is a trouble I commented on frequently during this debate about jury trials, and there is a question about the power of visitation that I spoke of this morning when that clause of the bill was under consideration. In addition to that we have got to run the risk in the courts of the effect of the severe penalties that have been commented on previously in this debate not only by myself, but by many others.

So, Mr. President, when we shall have done for this bill all we have done and all we are likely to do, so far as we are at present advised, it will be a bill as to which there can be urged very serious objections. It may perish—and it is my opinion that it will—in the courts.

Now, whether Senators agree with me in that or not, they must concede, one and all, and I think one and all do concede, that these serious objections to the validity and constitutionality of the bill will remain, after we have done all we can, to be urged against it in the courts.

Now, Mr. President, I take it that every Senator here is actuated by a desire to remedy the evils that have been justly complained of by the shippers of this country. I have no other purpose. I want a law that will be efficient, a law that will be upheld in the courts, a law that will not be a disappointment to the people of this country when we have put it upon the statute books; and it is because we have apprehension about the efficiency and the constitutionality of the bill we have been considering that I have, by the amendment which has just been read at the Clerk's desk, suggested an alternative remedy.

Now, that is what I want Senators to get into their minds. What I have suggested is not in conflict with a line of the bill we have been considering. It does not weaken or destroy any provision of the bill. It is an addition to that. It is what I have properly called it, an alternative remedy. It provides that when a complaint is made to the Interstate Commerce Commission, the complainant, whether the complainant be a shipper or be a community, whether the complaint be of a rebate or of an excessive rate, or of a discrimination, the complainant shall, if he so desires, make known to the Commission that instead of proceeding before the Commission under the bill we have been considering, to there have a full and complete hearing and then to go into the courts to have all that reviewed, shall make request of the Commission, and it shall be the duty of the Commission to send it at once to the court. First, of course, I should have said, the Commission shall stop to inquire whether or not there is a reasonable ground for the complaint.

If Senators will look at the amendment I have offered, they will see it is but an amendment of the existing law. The Commission shall stop and inquire, when they receive the complaint in a preliminary way, whether there is probable ground for the complaint. They shall see whether or not they can induce the railroad, just as they do now, to desist from the practice, if they think they are engaged in a wrong practice. Failing in that, they shall at once send it to the court, where it shall be prosecuted by the United States district attorney in the name of the United States, without any expense whatever to the shipper; and it shall apply to excessive rates, to rebates, and to discriminations.

Mr. President, I have not time, as Senators recognize, to go into any detailed and elaborate explanation of this amendment. I want to say again, as I have said heretofore, that this is a proposition by which I am seeking only to broaden and strengthen existing law. It is a law that has already been put to the test in the courts. It has been found efficient, for notwithstanding criticisms that have been passed upon it in the course of this discussion, it is the law under which to-day everything is being done that is being done by the Department of Justice to break up and prevent these practices of which the people so complain as against the railroads.

Now, while we are legislating about this subject, while we are familiar with it, when we are fully advised, I do not understand why, in addition to the particular plan we have already legislated upon, we should not make better and stronger and more efficient the law under which these proceedings are already being successfully carried forward.

That is all there is of this amendment. I might cite authorities, and I would gladly do that if it should be necessary, to show that there is not a provision here that has not been passed on by the courts favorably. There is not a provision here that the courts have not expressly upheld, and therefore if we should adopt the amendment we have no risk to run in that regard.

I hope the amendment may be adopted.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I regret that I can not see my way clear to agree with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] in respect to this amendment. I realize the beneficent purpose he has in view; but the practical effect of the amendment, in the first instance, is to transfer the rate-making power from the Commission to the court. The first clause provides that after any complaint is made to the Interstate Commerce Commission in reference to unjust and unreasonable rates and discriminations "between shippers, places, commodities, or otherwise," whether it is affected by rebates, etc., the complainant may in that case, if he prefers, without any other ceremony bring it into court.

In reference to that provision, I wish to suggest how easy it would be for a railroad company to get some shipper to make a pro forma complaint to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and then after he has made that complaint avail himself of this privilege and take it into court. Then on page 3 of the amendment you will find the following:

> And upon being satisfied of the truth of the allegations of said petition said court shall enjoin, according to the ground of complaint, the publishing and charging of all of any such rate or rates so complained of, in excess of what the court shall find to be reasonable and just, which shall continue to be the lawful rate as heretofore and now prescribed by statute.

That amounts to nothing else, Mr. President, than the court in that case to pronounce upon the rate complained of, and then if the court find that any part of the rate is too high, to scale it down and fix a rate that is just and reasonable. Now, that is in fact the power we propose to vest in the Interstate Commerce Commission. It is giving the court the right in the first instance to exercise a legislative function to pass upon rates.

I have not time to dwell more on that feature of the amendment, but I want to call your attention to the remarkable concluding paragraph, which attempts not only to nullify the interstate-commerce act, but also the Sherman Act.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator from Minnesota is mistaken. I did not offer that as a part of the amendment. Even if it had been offered, it is only what the President has recommended twice to Congress at this session should be done. That is excluded, however. I do not stop to discuss it; but I commend to the Senator what I think would be a very good reason for it.

Mr. NELSON. I will simply say that I am glad the Senator has excluded it, because, in my mind, that was the worst feature of it. The language is:

SEC. —. That nothing in the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, or in the act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies, approved July 2, 1890—or in any act amendatory of either of said acts, shall hereafter apply to the establishment of rates or the changing or publication of the same with respect to foreign commerce, or shall prohibit any necessary and reasonable agreement of two or more carriers with respect to rates or charges and the maintenance and observance of the same for interstate transportation that is not in unreasonable restraint of trade or commerce with foreign nations or among the several States.

That is the Sherman antitrust law—

But, leaving out that part of it, the objection, as I said, to the other portion of the amendment which the Senator from Ohio has offered is that it would be entirely in contravention of the spirit and purpose of this act, which proposes to give the rate-making power to the Interstate Commerce Commission in the first instance, and then to allow their action to be subsequently reviewed. This proposes to have the court, upon complaint of a shipper, investigate the question and pass upon the rate as to whether it is too high or too low; and if too high, to scale it down; so that if a rate of a dollar a hundred is complained of, the court can scale it down and say: "We find 75 cents a hundred is a reasonable rate, and we will enjoin all in excess of that." Then there is no limitation as to the period of time the court may enjoin the rate.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I do not wish to reply to the Senator from Minnesota, but I wish to ask him a question, if he will yield for that purpose.

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. I want simply to say to him that, so far as the power of the court to enjoin a rate is concerned, I have followed the decisions in 7 Federal Reporter, in 8 Federal Reporter, in 123 Federal Reporter, in 186 United States Reports, 174 Massachusetts Reports, and in a number of other cases.

But the question I want to ask the Senator from Minnesota is, why should not the shipper have the right to have his case proceeded with in the courts, where there is only one hearing, and without any expense at all, rather than compel him to have two hearings at his own expense, as now?

Mr. NELSON. For the reason that the rate-making power is not invested in the courts, in the first instance, but belongs to the Interstate Commerce Commission. That is the objection to it.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator will allow me, there is no rate-making power whatever conferred on the court here. The court is authorized to hear and determine what is a just and reasonable rate, which is the lawful rate prescribed by the statute; and if the carrier was charging any more than the lawful rate the court is authorized to enjoin all in excess of it; in other words, not to make a rate, but to give effect to a rate which Congress has made.

Mr. NELSON. The judicial power is limited to this: The court has the right to say whether a rate complained of is too high or too low and to enjoin it; but the court has no right to go further and say that any other rate below that is just and reasonable. What I have stated is the limit of the power of the court.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER].

Mr. FORAKER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and having been taken, the result was announced—yeas 10, nays 56, as follows:

YEAS—10.

Aldrich	Foraker	Morgan	Wetmore
Bulkeley	Gallinger	Platt
Dick	Kean	Scott

NAYS—56.

Alger	Clay	Gearin	Newlands
Allee	Crane	Hansbrough	Nixon
Allison	Culberson	Kittredge	Overman
Bailey	Cullom	Knox	Perkins
Berry	Daniel	La Follette	Pettus
Blackburn	Dillingham	Latimer	Piles
Brandegee	Dolliver	Lodge	Proctor
Burkett	Dryden	Long	Rayner

Beveridge	Fulton	McEnery	Spooner
Burton	Gorman	Millard	Sutherland
Carmack	Hale	Money	Warren
Clark, Wyo.	Hemenway	Patterson

So Mr. FORAKER's amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I offer an amendment——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the Senator from Alabama first rose.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I give way to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], and desire to be recognized later.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will recognize the Senator from Wisconsin later.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Very well.

Mr. MORGAN. I offer an amendment as a separate section, which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed at the end of section 7 to insert the following:

That nothing in this act contained shall be construed as depriving any person who sues in his own right and name from instituting any suit under its provisions, or any other suit, at law or in equity, in any State court, or in any court of the United States, against any common carrier.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KEAN. Let the amendment be again stated, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama.

The Secretary again read Mr. MORGAN's amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The roll will be called.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SPOONER (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK]. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 23, nays 41, as follows:

YEAS—23.

Berry	Dubois	McLaurin	Rayner
Blackburn	Foster	Mallory	Scott
Bulkeley	Frye	Martin	Simmons
Clark, Mont.	Gearin	Morgan	Taliaferro
Clay	Latimer	Pettus	Tillman
Daniel	McEnery	Platt

NAYS—41.

Aldrich	Clarke, Ark.	Gamble	Nelson
Alger	Crane	Hansbrough	Nixon
Allee	Cullom	Hemenway	Perkins
Allison	Dick	Hopkins	Piles
Ankeny	Dillingham	Kean	Proctor
Brandegee	Dolliver	Kittredge	Sutherland
Burkett	Dryden	Knox	Warner
Burnham	Flint	Lodge	Wetmore
Burrows	Foraker	Long
Carter	Fulton	McCumber
Clapp	Gallinger	Millard

NOT VOTING—25.

Bacon	Depew	McCreary	Spooner
Bailey	Elkins	Money	Stone
Beveridge	Frazier	Newlands	Teller
Burton	Gorman	Overman	Warren
Carmack	Hale	Patterson
Clark, Wyo.	Heyburn	Penrose
Culberson	La Follette	Smoot

So Mr. MORGAN's amendment was rejected.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 7 it is proposed to add a new section, to be known as section 7 (a), as follows:

SEC. 7 (a). That the Commission is authorized and empowered to require all railroads engaged in interstate commerce as defined by this act to adopt the block system upon all its lines over which passenger trains are run prior to the 1st day of July, 1911, and the Commission may after reasonable notice and hearing determine and by order direct the portion of such lines upon which the block system shall be adopted and installed, not exceeding one-fourth of the entire mileage of the passenger lines of such railroad in any one year. That any railroad failing to comply with any lawful order made by the Commission hereunder shall be liable to a penalty of $1,000 for each day that such failure continues, to be recovered in a suit to be brought in the name of the United States by the United States attorney in the circuit court of the United States having jurisdiction in the locality where such violation shall have occurred, and it shall be the duty of such United States attorney to bring such suit upon duly verified information being lodged with him of such violation. For the purposes of this act the term "block system" shall be taken to mean the methods and rules by means of which the movement of railroad trains may be regulated in such manner that an interval of space of absolute length may at all time be maintained between the rear end of a train and the forward end of the train next following. The term shall be taken to include automatic block signaling, so called, but no order shall specify the kind of block system or make or cause any discrimination between automatic, so called, and nonautomatic.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, scarcely a day passes that does not record some case of gross negligence on the part of a railroad company in the operation of its trains, resulting in collision and in the consequent destruction of the lives of passengers and of employees. The accidents which occur in the United States outnumber those of foreign countries three, four, five, and six to one, depending upon the country with which comparison is made. In the year ending June 30, 1905, the railroads of the United States killed and injured 10,617 passengers and 48,487 employees.

An instructive comparison may be made with the railroads of England. England has a little over 22,000 miles of road. We have over 200,000 miles of road. The passenger trains of England in 1903 traveled less than one-half the total mileage which the passenger trains in this country traveled, but the English railroads carried twice as many passengers as were carried by the railroads of the United States during that year. It will thus be seen that the English trains were much more heavily loaded and followed each other much more closely in order to handle this traffic on their limited trackage.

It is accepted, sir, as a rule of accidents, that they increase somewhat in proportion to the density of the traffic. The density of the English traffic as compared with the traffic in this country is as 6 to 1, but, notwithstanding that fact and the further fact that England hauled twice as many passengers with a train mileage less than half as great as ours, and did the work with only 22,000 miles of track, its railroads killed and injured in 1903 only one-tenth of the number killed and injured by the railroads of this country in that year. England has adopted the block system, and requires the railroads of that country to operate under it.

But there is another reason, Mr. President, why the fatalities and injuries in this country exceed those of other countries. The parsimonious policy pursued by the railroad companies and their failure to employ a sufficient number of men to guard their tracks is responsible to a large extent for the excessive number of accidents. The railroads of the United States kill six and a half times as many and injure twenty-nine times as many passengers as the Prussian railroads; while the number of employees killed in the United States is more than three times and the number of injured more than twenty-five times as great, relatively, as the number killed and injured on the Prussian railroads.

The significant fact that helps us to understand this difference is that in the case of relatively the same number of miles of track the Prussian roads employ 636,000 men where the railways of the United States employ 50,000 men.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that it is time to require the railroads of this country to exercise greater care for safeguarding the traveling public. The adoption of the amendment which I have introduced is an important step in that direction.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I have another amendment which I desire to offer, to come in at the end of the section.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 25, after line 2, at the end of section 7, it is proposed to insert a new section, to be known as section 20 (a), to read as follows:

SEC. 20 (a). That every common carrier by railroad subject to the provisions of this act shall be liable for damages for all injuries, whether resulting in death or not, sustained by any of its employees, subject to the provisions hereinafter contained regarding contributory negligence on the part of the injured employee:

a. When such injury is caused by a defect in any locomotive, engine, car, rail, track, roadbed, machinery, or appliance required by said common carrier to be used by its employees in and about the business of their employment.

b. When such injury shall have been sustained by any officer, agent, servant, or employee of such common carrier while engaged in the line of his duty as such and which injury shall have been caused in whole or in greater part by the carelessness or negligence of any other employee, officer, agent, or servant of such common carrier in the discharge of or by reason of failure to discharge his duties as such.

In every action to recover damages for such injuries or death the court shall submit to the jury the question whether the employee injured or killed was guilty of contributory negligence, and shall instruct the jury that if they shall answer such question in the affirmative, that they shall then answer the following question: Was the negligence of the employee injured (or killed) slighter or greater as a contributing cause to such injury (or death) than the negligence or carelessness of the common carrier, or any other officer, agent, or employee of such common carrier? And in all cases where the jury shall find the carelessness or negligence of the common carrier, or any other officer, agent, or employee of such common carrier, was greater than the negligence of the employee so injured or killed, and contributed in a greater degree to such injury or death, then the plaintiff shall be entitled to recover, and the negligence, if any, of the employee so injured or killed shall be no bar to such recovery, and in all cases under this act the questions of negligence and contributory negligence shall be for the jury.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, in legislation for the protection of railway employees certain elementary facts should be considered. The employment is an extra hazardous one. From the very character of the business a railway employee is at the mercy of every other employee with whom he works. He can exercise no choice of association. He is bound to work with his coemployee, whatever his character. He is part of a system. He may be placed in great jeopardy through the carelessness of a fellow-servant, and yet be compelled to accept the risk, or imperil others whose safety depends upon his self-sacrifice.

The personal safety and lives of the public and the property of the public depend upon the fidelity and courage of men employed in the railway service. The proper safeguarding of railway employees is a matter of public concern. It is a plain proposition that in proportion as the liability of the railway company is increased, for the acts and defaults of its officers, agents, and employees, in that degree will be secured greater diligence and care upon its part, and the hazard to the public thereby lessened.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. MALLORY. I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin, for my own information, as to his idea of the application of the terms of this amendment if it is enacted into law? Every accident of this kind has to occur in a State, and each State has its laws on the subject. Some States have passed laws modifying the common law on the subject. In fact most of them have. I should like to inquire of the Senator whether the amendment, as he proposes to enact it into law, would take precedence of the State laws on the same subject where a railroad is engaged in interstate commerce? It seems to me there would be a conflict necessarily if the laws differed.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It would apply to injuries received in interstate traffic. I can take no more time, because I have here some matter which I wish to have presented on this question. It gives the history of this legislation, and I ask that the Secretary may read it as a part of my remarks. I may say that the communication is from Mr. Fuller, the representative of the railroad organizations of the country, maintained here by them to look after their legislation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin that the document submitted by him be read by the Secretary? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin a question.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I can not yield, because I have some matter——

Mr. OVERMAN. I merely wish to ask how the amendment differs from the bill now before the Interstate Commerce Committee?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It differs very materially. I regret that there is not time to discuss the points of difference fully.

The Secretary proceeded to read the communication.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. As my time has expired, I request leave to have the remainder of the communication printed in the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin? The Chair hears none.

The communication in full is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 1, 1906.

Hon. ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: In compliance with your personal request, I take pleasure in submitting the following history of employers' liability bills relating to railroads introduced in Congress:

On December 8, 1885, and during the first session of the Forty-ninth Congress, a bill relating to the liability of railroad companies to their employees was introduced in the Senate by Senator J. Z. George, of Mississippi. This bill was numbered S. 181, and was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, but received no further consideration.

On February 15, 1896, and during the third session of the Fifty-third Congress, a similar bill was introduced in the House by Congressman M. J. McEttrick, of Massachusetts. This bill was numbered H. R. 8881, and was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, but received no further consideration.

On December 5, 1895, and during the first session of the Fifty-fourth Congress, Senator Wilkinson Call, of Florida, introduced a similar bill in the Senate, which was numbered S. 498. This bill received no consideration by the Committee on Interstate Commerce, to which it was referred.

On February 28, 1902, and during the first session of the Fifty-seventh Congress, Congressman J. S. Little, of Arkansas, introduced a bill (H. R. 11913) entitled "A bill to define who are and who are not fellow-servants of persons, corporations, and companies, and defining the defense of said corporations, persons, and companies on account thereof." This bill was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, but received no further consideration.

On December 8, 1902, and during the second session of the Fifty-seventh Congress, a bill relating to the liabiliay of common carriers by railroad in the District of Columbia and the Territories, and common carriers by railroad engaged in interstate commerce, to their employees was introduced in the Senate by Senator H. C. LODGE, of Massachusetts. This bill was numbered S. 6451, and was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. During the same session, and on December 12, 1902, the same bill was introduced in the House by Representatives by A. L. BATES, of Pennsylvania. This bill was numbered H. R. 15990, and was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. These bills received no consideration by the committees to which they were referred.

Bills identical with the Lodge-Bates bills were introduced during the second session of the Fifty-eighth Congress, the first one, H. R. 7041, by Mr. Bates on December 11, 1903, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, which committee took no action upon it. The second one, S. 4092, by Senator BOIES PENROSE, of Pennsylvania, on February 3, 1904. This bill was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. On March 7, 1904, Senator G. F. Hoar, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on the Judiciary, asked that said committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, which request was agreed to by the Senate. The bill remained in the Committee on Interstate Commerce during the rest of the Fifty-eighth Congress and no report was made upon it. On February 17, 1905, the following statement was made by the junior Senator from Virginia, Mr. MARTIN.

"LIABILITY OF COMMON CARRIERS.

"Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Committee on Interstate Commerce to the bill (S. 4092) relating to liability of common carriers by railroads in the District of Columbia and Territories and common carriers by railroads engaged in commerce between the States and between the States and foreign nations to their employees. It is the bill generally known as the 'employers' liability bill.' I wish to say that this bill was referred to the Interstate Commerce Committee more than twelve months ago. I simply desire to invite the attention of the committee to it. It is to be hoped that some report, either favorable or adverse, will be made at an early date. I do not at present move to discharge the committee from the further consideration of the bill, but I feel that it is proper for me to call this matter to the attention of the committee and invite them to consider it and give us a report."

On March 2, 1905, the following action was taken by the Senate:

"INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMITTEE INVESTIGATION.

"Mr. KEAN. I am directed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution proposing an investigation by the Interstate Commerce Committee, to report it favorably without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

"The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). The resolution will be read.

"The resolution reported by Mr. KEAN, from the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate on the 28th ultimo, was read, as follows:

"'Resolved, That the Committee on Interstate Commerce, or any subcommittee thereof, is instructed to sit during the recess of the Senate, at such times and places as may suit the convenience of said committee or subcommittee, to consider the question of additional legislation to regulate interstate commerce and to authorize the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix rates of freights and fares, and to acquire further information as to interstate commerce, including violations or evasions of the antirebate law and the devices and methods by which evasions are accomplished, and including refrigerator and other private car systems, industrial railway tracks, switching charges, and the like; said committee or subcommittee is authorized to employ experts, administer oaths, take testimony, send for persons and papers, employ a stenographer to report its hearings, and to have them printed, which hearings shall be sent, as soon as printed, to each member of the Senate. Said committee shall make a full report of its proceedings hereunder by bill or otherwise within ten days after the meeting of the next Congress. And all necessary expenses to carry out the provisions of this resolution shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.'

* * * * * * *

"Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the resolution, which I ask may be read.

"The SECRETARY. In line 12, after the word 'like,' insert:

"'And also to consider what legislation should be enacted in relation to the liability of railroad companies engaged in interstate traffic or operating lines in any Territory of the United States for injuries received by their employees when in discharge of duty.'

"Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, personally I have no objection to that amendment, but as this is a resolution prepared by a subcommittee of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and includes all the subjects they thought were proper for them to consider, I do not feel authorized to accept it. I know that the Committee on Interstate Commerce is perfectly willing to consider what is known as the 'employers' liability bill' at any time when they have occasion, or when it is called to their attention. Therefore I do not feel authorized to accept the amendment.

"Mr. MARTIN. As I understand the Senator from New Jersey, he thinks that the proposition embraced in the amendment is already included in his resolution.

"Mr. KEAN. Practically so.

"Mr. MARTIN. And he also says that the committee to act under his resolution will certainly take up this matter if asked to do it. If that is so, it is inconceivable that there should be any objection to the amendment.

"Mr. President, this amendment is, in my judgment, one of importance. There are about 300,000 men in the United States engaged in the train service. The measure of liability of the railroad companies to these employees under existing law is exceedingly unsatisfactory and unjust. The old doctrine of fellow-servants which grew up under very different conditions from such as we have to-day is still in force in many of the States. In my own State it has been abolished, and in most of the States of the Union it has been abolished.

"A bill was introduced here at the commencement of the Fifty-eighth Congress seeking to have this antiquated and unjust doctrine abolished in all interstate traffic. That bill has slumbered in the committee room. I have made earnest efforts to get a report on the bill in order that the Senate might vote upon it. I have been unable to get a report. The employees engaged in this important and responsible service feel that they have a right to have Congress consider this question and pass upon it one way or the other. It was of sufficient importance to induce the President of the United States, in his annual message sent to Congress, to make recommendations that a law should be enacted on this subject.

"All I ask is that there be left no doubt about the duty of this committee, when it takes up the question of amending the laws in relation to interstate commerce, to take up also this proposition and examine it in the vacation and make a report at the commencement of the next session of Congress, so that it may be dealt with in one way or another. I think the amendment is one that commends itself to the consideration of the Senate, and I hope it will be adopted.

"Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, the resolution offered by the Senator from New Jersey in behalf of the committee deals with an entirely different question, a question of sufficient importance for one committee; and I should like to suggest to the Senator from Virginia, if I can have his attention for a moment, that it would be better for him to raise a committee on this particular subject. In the first place, to load the committee with two very important questions of this kind is simply to have delay in getting results. I shall be glad to join the Senator in raising a proper committee for this special purpose.

"I agree with him that most of the States have gotten rid of the antiquated idea he speaks of. The State in which I live has passed a law upon the subject and probably does not need any more, and some other States have done the same. What I am anxious about is that the committee suggested by the resolution which was reported by the Senator from New Jersey shall proceed, and proceed intelligently and thoroughly, to do what I think they will find big enough work for any committee during vacation.

"It may be that I am impressed with the difficulty they are going to meet more than I ought to be, but I know something about this matter. I doubt whether there is a committee in the Senate now, if they had the facts before them, that could under several weeks arrange the facts in such way as to determine what line of procedure they should adopt in order to carry out the purpose of a just and proper regulation of these roads. I have been anxious for years that we should regulate them in the interest of the transportation people who are using them, and in the interest also of the people who have their money in these roads. I said the other day I should look—I think I used the term 'terror,' if I did not, I can now—upon the proposition if I thought it would be accepted that the Government of the United States should attempt to manage and control all the lines of transportation which are engaged in interstate commerce, for that practically includes all the roads in the United States.

"I hope the Senator from Virginia will move for a separate committee, and I shall be glad to join him in raising such a committee, but it ought not to be composed of the same membership as the committee that is charged with this other great duty.

"The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

"Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I was inclined to share the views of the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] as to a joint commission to inquire into the matter of rate regulation. Some time ago, anticipating that the Senate would not have time at this session to finally dispose of this question, I introduced a resolution providing for such a joint commission and defining the principles which should control in the framing of a comprehensive law, intended to meet every phase of the interstate-commerce question, providing for a national incorporation of railways, providing for a valuation of the railways and stock issued and bonds issued upon such valuation, and the approval of all bonds and stocks hereafter issued by such corporation by the Interstate Commerce Commission. These resolutions also provided for rate regulation by the Interstate Commerce Commission and for a pension for disabled employees, thus covering the question raised by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], and also for arbitration between railroads and their employees.

"Those resolutions have gone to the Interstate Commerce Commission for their views as to the plans outlined and for suggestions and modifications of such plans, and they have also gone to the Commissioner of Corporations for similar report.

"Now, Mr. President, I wish to add that I believe that if this committee of the Senate can sit consecutively for one month without being disturbed by other business it will be prepared to submit a bill to the Senate which ought to meet the approval of everyone.

"For that reason I am in favor of the immediate session of this committee, and I am in favor of an early session of Congress for the purpose of considering its report. I trust the President of the United States will call an extra session in the middle of April, or the first of May, in order that we may be able to dispose of this question, clear our decks and proceed to other matters of reform legislation called for by the President's message, for I am glad to say that that message is, for the first time in the last decade, devoted almost entirely to questions of domestic reform, those questions which have not received the consideration which they ought to have received whilst the country has been engaged in this era of expansion and of legislation regarding extra-territorial questions.

"I believe the time has now come for the serious consideration of many domestic problems, and I am glad to see that the President of the United States has called attention to them in his message. I believe that these extra sessions should be called for until these questions are disposed of.

"We have one great question now pending of reform in our public-land laws, which ought to be the next question taken up, and, if it is not disposed of by the next Congress, I hope that an extra session will be called for the purpose of considering it.

"Now, Mr. President, I do not believe there will be any adjustment of this railroad question, any complete adjustment, until we unify and simplify the railway systems of this country, and I do not believe we can accomplish that except through a national incorporation act, and that in inaugurating a national incorporation act we should simplify the system of taxation by making it a matter of mere mathematical calculation in the shape of a percentage tax on gross receipts, and thus do away with these innumerable taxing bodies and these innumerable taxing officials, and that we should center the power of rate regulation as far as practicable in one great tribunal of character and dignity, whose judgment will be looked upon with respect by the entire American people.

"This is all I have to say regarding this resolution. I should have preferred a resolution for a joint commission. I believe a joint commission has worked admirably with reference to the merchant marine question. I believe it would work admirably with reference to this question and would bring the two Houses in harmony; but as it seems impossible to secure it I shall vote for this resolution.

"The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

"Mr. HALE. I do not object, if the Senator from New Jersey can bring the matter to a conclusion immediately, but the general deficiency appropriation bill ought to be taken up at once.

"Mr. CULLOM. I agree to that, and I think that the resolution is about to be adopted. I do not mean the amendment of the Senator from Virginia. I do not want that to be attached to the resolution. If we load up this committee with all sorts of questions pertaining to the general subject of regulation, we shall never get to the end of it, and we shall get nothing done.

"The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

"Mr. CARMACK. Mr. President——

"Mr. HALE. I must object.

"Mr. CARMACK. I am entirely in sympathy with the purpose of the resolution, and I hope under the circumstances the Senator from Virginia will withdraw his amendment.

"Mr. CULLOM. And bring it in hereafter.

"Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I have not the slightest idea of withdrawing the amendment. If the Senate wants to have the matter considered which is presented by this amendment there is no reason why it should not be done in this way. There is nothing in this proposition to hinder investigation on the main proposition. I realize that the question of regulating the rate making is the most important question now interesting this country, and under no circumstances would I impede that investigation.

"But I do not intend that a proposition of this sort shall be disposed of without having fair consideration at so opportune a time as is presented now. I have been trying for a long time to get the Committee on Interstate Commerce——

"Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, I will accept the amendment.

"Mr. MARTIN. All right.

"Mr. KEAN. And let the resolution pass.

"Mr. HALE. Let us have a vote.

"Mr. KEAN. I can not take up the time of the Senate at this late hour.

"The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Virginia.

"The amendment was agreed to.

"The resolution as amended was agreed to."

During the recess of the Senate various witnesses appeared both for and against legislation making railroad companies liable to their employees for injuries received in the course of employment.

On December 4, 1905, and during the present session, Representative BATES again introduced his bill, which was numbered H. R. 239, and was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. On December 6, 1905, S. 156, the same being a bill identical with the Penrose bill of the last Congress, was introduced by Senator J. W. DANIEL, of Virginia, and the Penrose bill was reintroduced on December 14, 1905, by Senator PENROSE. This bill was numbered S. 1657, and both it and the Daniel bill were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. On December 14, 1905, that chairman of the committee, Senator S. B. ELKINS, of West Virginia, made the following report:

"Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, I ask permission out of order to make a verbal report from the Interstate Commerce Committee.

"The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from West Virginia asks permis-Senate March 2, 1905, authorizing the Committee on Interstate Commerce. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none.

"Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, under the resolution adopted by the Senate March 2, 1905, authorizing the Committee on Interstate Commerce to hold sessions during the recess of the Senate, I am instructed to report that the committee proceeded, under the resolution, Monday, April 17, and continued its sessions until the early part of June. The committee gave hearings to all persons who manifested a desire to be heard on the subject. The result of the labors of the committee is contained in five volumes of testimony, which has been put in print, and I now place it, by direction of the committee, before the Senate for such disposition.

"Under the terms of the resolution the committee was required to report in ten days after the beginning of the present session of the Senate by bill or otherwise. While the committee can not report a bill to-day, I am authorized to state to the Senate, on behalf of the committee, that it went into session on the 21st of November and has been holding meetings, not every day since, but as often as it suited the convenience of the members, to consider the various and difficult subjects raised in the resolution that was adopted by the Senate. The committee is giving careful consideration to the subject-matter of the questions which have been raised, and I am authorized to state that it is the belief of the members of the committee that later on it will be able to report a bill to the Senate for its consideration."

On January 29 and 30, 1906, the following took place in the Senate:

IN THE SENATE,
Monday, January 29, 1906.

* * * * * * *

"EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY BILLS.

"Mr. ELKINS. I am instructed by the Committee on Interstate Commerce to ask to be discharged from the further consideration of Senate bill 156 and Senate bill 1657, two bills on the same subject, and which are alike, and to ask that they be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with the accompanying documents.

"Mr. PENROSE. I believe I introduced one of these bills, and I should like to ask the Senator from West Virginia whether both of these measures have been already taken from the Judiciary Committee and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce by order of the Senate?

"Mr. ELKINS. I think not. I will make this explanation: In the resolution authorizing the Interstate Commerce Committee to take testimony during the recess of the Senate the subject covered by these two bills was included. The committee accordingly took testimony on that subject, and I have accompanied with the bills the testimony taken in part, and we have further testimony which we will send down to the Judiciary Committee. The Committee on Interstate Commerce was of the opinion unanimously that the subject belongs to the Judiciary Committee.

"Mr. PENROSE. I did not quite understand the order of the Senate in the sense placed upon it by the Senator from West Virginia. I understood that the Senate simply made an order that the bill was improperly referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and properly belongs to the Interstate Commerce Committee. So it seems to me rather an unusual and extraordinary proceeding for the Senate to take a bill from one committee for the purpose of referring it to another committee with the object of taking testimony on the measure.

"Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

"The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

"Mr. PENROSE. Certainly.

"Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I should like to inquire what the bills relate to.

"Mr. PENROSE. They are known as 'employers' liability bills.' One of them was introduced by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] and the other was introduced by me. They are both on similar lines. If it is the practice of the Senate to take a bill from one committee and refer it to another committee for the purpose of taking testimony thereon, then I have much to learn about the practice of the Senate. But if the Interstate Commerce Committee desires to avoid its responsibility in the consideration of this measure and to refer the bills back to the committee from which they have already been formally taken by the Senate, then it seems to me it is time for the Senate to pause and consider whether the bills can fairly be permitted to be taken from one committee to another without any prospect of definite action from either.

"I ask the Senator from West Virginia to permit his request to go over until to-morrow, so that we can ascertain just what was the order of the Senate in reference to these bills. Surely they were not referred to the committee of which the distinguished Senator is chairman simply for the purpose of relieving the Judiciary Committee of the labor and responsibility of taking testimony.

"Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, this is the first time I have heard that these two bills were ever before the Committee on the Judiciary. It is quite new to me.

"Mr. PENROSE. That is my information, Mr. President.

"Mr. ELKINS. They came to us, if the Senator will allow me, as original bills, introduced by the Senator from Virginia and the Senator from Pennsylvania. The subject-matter of the two bills was covered in the resolution, and it was investigated and we took testimony; and I tried to accompany the testimony taken in print with the motion I made. It was the judgment of the committee that these bills and this subject belong to the Judiciary Committee. I do not think the committee had any knowledge whatever of the bills having ever been before the Judiciary Committee.

"I quite willingly consent to the suggestion that the matter may go over until the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senate are better informed on the subject.

"Mr. PENROSE. My attention was only called to the fact a few moments ago that this action was contemplated, and I certainly thought I received the information that the bills had been taken from the Judiciary Committee and transferred to the Interstate Commerce Committee. I am not certain that I am correct, and that is the reason why I should like to have the matter go over until it can be thoroughly examined.

"The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the motion of the Senator from West Virginia——

"Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, I simply rose to ask the Senator from West Virginia if it is not a fact that practically the same bills were introduced at a previous session and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and the Committee on the Judiciary asked to be relieved from the further consideration of the bills and have them referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce? Was not that done at a previous session?

"Mr. ELKINS. I have no remembrance of the fact. I do not think that was the action taken.

"Mr. BEVERIDGE. Did not the bills come to your committee in that way?

"Mr. ELKINS. No; the bills came to the Interstate Commerce Committee as bills introduced in the Senate and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

"Mr. LODGE. I wish to inquire simply what is the request before the Senate? I did not hear it.

"The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from West Virginia moves that the Committee on Interstate Commerce be discharged from the further consideration of Senate bill 156 and Senate bill 1657 and that they be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The Senator from West Virginia assents to the request that his motion may lie over until to-morrow, and without objection it is so ordered.

"Mr. BEVERIDGE. I would suggest, Mr. President, the record ought to show what the facts are in this interesting matter, and between now and the time the request of the Senator comes up for consideration to-morrow the record should be looked into. Certainly it is an important thing, if a bill has been referred to one committee, and then that committee asks to be relieved from it and have it referred to another committee and that is done, and then that committee asks to have it referred back to the first one. Are reports of committees in order?

"The VICE-PRESIDENT. Reports of standing and select committees are now in order."

IN THE SENATE,
Tuesday, January 30, 1906.

"EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY BILLS.

"Mr. DANIEL. I inquire whether the motion of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] for the discharge of the Committee on Interstate Commerce from what are known as the 'employers' liability bills' has been laid before the Senate?

"The VICE-PRESIDENT. It has not yet been laid before the Senate, but will be when in order.

"Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I inquire if the routine morning business has been concluded?

"The VICE-PRESIDENT. The routine morning business has not been closed. Are there any further concurrent or other resolutions? If not, the morning business is closed.

"Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

"The VICE-PRESIDENT. If the Senator from Colorado will withhold for a moment, the Chair will lay before the Senate the request of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], coming over from yesterday, that the Committee on Interstate Commerce be discharged from the further consideration of Senate bill 156 and Senate bill 1657, and that they be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with the accompanying documents. Is there objection to the request?

"Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, I do not see in the Chamber the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], but I observe the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] is present. I have looked into the RECORD with respect to the disposition of the bills referred to at the last session and at the present session of the Senate, and I find that in the Fifty-eighth Congress, second session, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] introduced Senate bill 4092, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

"On March 7, 1904, Senator Hoar, from the Committee on the Judiciary (see vol. 38, pt. 3, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 2906), asked that said committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, which was agreed to.

"In the Fifty-ninth Congress, first session, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] introduced Senate bill 1657, which was referred to the Commitee on Interstate Commerce; and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] introduced Senate bill 156, which was referred to the same committee.

"Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

"The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Nevada?

"Mr. ELKINS. I do.

"Mr. NEWLANDS. I simply ask that we may have order in the Chamber, as it is impossible to hear what is being said.

"The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate will be in order.

"Mr. ELKINS. The two bills I have named are those which are covered by the motion I made yesterday under instructions from the Committee on Interstate Commerce, that they be discharged from their further consideration and that they be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

"The question that is raised on these bills is covered in the resolution authorizing sessions of the Interstate Commerce Committee during the recess of the Senate. That question came up also in connection with these two bills, and the committee authorized the chairman to report that they had considered the subject and felt that it belonged rather to the Committee on the Judiciary than to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. Therefore it was that I made the motion yesterday that is now before the Senate.

"Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, there are two bills involved in this motion. One was offered by myself on December 6, 1905, and the other a little later by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE].

"Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It is impossible for us to hear, Mr. President.

"The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate will be in order.

"Mr. DANIEL. As I have said, the other bill was introduced a little later——

"Mr. TELLER. I think we ought to have order enough to be able to hear what is going on. Nobody on this side of the Chamber heard the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] and I doubt whether anybody on the other side can hear the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL]. I think we had better have order established before the Senator from Virginia proceeds.

"Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, the motion of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] involves two bills. One was offered by myself on December 6, 1905, and the other by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] on December 14. Both of them, however, involve the same principle as a previous bill offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania, with some variations. They relate to the subject-matter of the liability of common carriers, of railroads in the District of Columbia and in the Territories, and as to that liability affecting their employees. The principle of the bill is that the carrier shall not be excused from negligence on account of the fellow-service of employees. That principle has been put into the constitution of the State of Virginia and has been adopted by the legislatures of many States. This is not the time to discuss it, nor do I propose to bring up the merits of either of those bills, but I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that a proposition of this general nature has been pending in this body for over four years, and that as yet no committee has made a report upon it. It first appeared on December 8, 1902, during the Fifty-seventh Congress, in a bill introduced by the present senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. That bill was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and there disappeared.

"On February 3, 1904, the Senator from Pennsylvania offered a bill of the same general nature, which was also referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. This was in the Fifty-eighth Congress.

"On March 7 of that year the then senior Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. Hoar, who was chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, reported that bill to the Senate and asked that that committee be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. This was agreed to. The bill at that session went to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, which made no report.

"In 1905, when the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN], from the Committee on Interstate Commerce, reported a resolution authorizing that committee to sit in vacation and to consider additional legislation on the interstate-commerce law, the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] offered an amendment, which I will read:

"'And also to consider what legislation should be enacted in relation to the liability of railroad companies engaged in interstate traffic or operating lines in any Territory of the United States for injuries received by their employees when in the discharge of duty.'

"This resolution was considered, amended, agreed to, and ordered to be printed.

"During the vacation of the last session I think this matter was taken under consideration by that committee in connection with other matters. On December 14 of the present session the chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], who has made this motion, reported that:

"'Under the terms of the resolution the committee was required to report in ten days after the beginning of the present session of the Senate by bill or otherwise. While the committee can not report a bill to-day, I am authorized to state to the Senate, on behalf of the committee, that it went into session on the 21st of November and has been holding meetings, not every day since, but as often as it suited the convenience of the members, to consider the various and difficult subjects raised in the resolution that was adopted by the Senate.'

"He concluded by saying:

"'It is the belief of the members of the committee that later on it will be able to report a bill to the Senate for its consideration.'

"Mr. President, I am not criticising the Senator from West Virginia, but I simply wish to fix the attention of the Senate upon the fact that a procedure in the nature of a game of battledore and shuttlecock has progressed in this body for now four years; and that, with no report on this measure, it now hangs fire again in the Senate, the committee to which it has been referred from year to year declining to make any report upon it.

"I am well aware, Mr. President, that that committee has had some of the gravest questions of the age under consideration; but at the same time the question involved in this separate measure is a matter which has been discussed for a decade or more in the United States, and the learning of it fills the judicial reports and the literature of the law. The principle is very simple, and a very few hours would enable any man to collate the substance of this learning and to determine which way he stood, one side or the other, on this question.

"There is now no legislation on this subject in the districts and Territories over which the United States has sole jurisdiction. All that I am seeking now is to get action on this bill and have it brought before the Senate, so that this body shall determine whether or not it desires to embody it into law. The Interstate Commerce Committee does not want it; the Judiciary Committee has twice had it—once affirmatively shelved it as an overcoat that they did not wish to wear, and the other time said nothing about it.

"I move, Mr. President, if it be in order to do so at this juncture, that this bill be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

"The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is pending a motion to refer, and the Senator's motion is not in order.

"Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

"The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Ohio?

"Mr. DANIEL. I yield to the Senator.

"Mr. FORAKER. I was not aware until a moment ago to what the Senator was addressing himself, having been otherwise occupied.

"Mr. DANIEL. It was with reference to the common carriers' liability bill.

"Mr. FORAKER. I am a member of the Interstate Commerce Committee, as the Senator knows, and I am also a member of the Committee on the Judiciary. I have no objection to considering these bills in either of those committees, and I do not think there is any objection to the consideration of them by the Interstate Commerce Committee.

"Mr. KEAN. None whatever.

"Mr. FORAKER. I am certainly quite willing to take up the bills for consideration at any time.

"In the Committee on Interstate Commerce we have been, as the Senator well knows, very busily occupied with the general railway-rate legislation proposition that has been referred to us for consideration. I do not think the request that these bills be sent to the Committee on the Judiciary was due to any lack of disposition on the part of the Interstate Commerce Committee to consider these particular bills. I know it was not so far as I am concerned.

"I might say more than that. I think attention was not particularly called to the bills at the time when this action was taken. I was otherwise engaged in the committee. I do not know how the other members of the committee feel, but I am quite sure that if these bills be left with the Interstate Commerce Committee or be sent to the Judiciary Committee they will receive attention. I know they will so far as I am concerned, and I have not heard of any member of either committee expressing any disposition not to give them consideration.

"I think the bills ought to go to the Judiciary Committee because of the important legal questions involved, or else they should remain with the Interstate Commerce Committee.

"The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS].

"Mr. DANIEL. I move to strike out "Committee on the Judiciary" and insert "Committee on Education and Labor" in the matter of reference. I suppose that motion is in order.

"Mr. ALDRICH. If I am not mistaken, Mr. President, the parliamentary situation is this: The chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce asked unanimous consent that that committee be discharged from the further consideration of this subject, and that the bills be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I think he made no motion at all upon the subject. It was a request for unanimous consent by the Senator from West Virginia, and that is not a motion.

"The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from West Virginia yesterday stated:

"'Mr. ELKINS. I am instructed by the Committee on Interstate Commerce to ask to be discharged from the further consideration of Senate bill 156 and Senate bill 1657, two bills on the same subject, and which are alike, and to ask that they be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with the accompanying documents.'

"The Chair understood this to be in effect a motion, and distinctly stated it to the Senate as a motion.

"Mr. DANIEL. That is right.

"Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I think the ordinary course of procedure is similar cases has been that unanimous consent has been asked. Such suggestions are usually made at a time when a motion would not be strictly in order. That has been the usual course.

"The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that under Rule XXVI a motion to discharge a committee from the further consideration of a specific subject must be considered as an independent proposition, and before considering the reference to another committee.

"Mr. ALDRICH. That is a motion.

"The VICE-PRESIDENT. Yes; a motion.

"Mr. ALDRICH. But it is not the intention, I am sure, of the committee, and I imagine it was not the intention of the chairman of the committee to make a motion to that effect, but simply to ask the Senate by unanimous consent to have this change of reference made. Of course that can only be done by unanimous consent.

"The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there should be objection to a request for unanimous consent, a motion would be in order.

"Mr. ALDRICH. If the Senator chose to make the motion; yes. But if he did not, I assume it would be entirely within his control.

"Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

"The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

"Mr. DANIEL. Certainly.

"Mr. PENROSE. I made objection yesterday to the unanimous consent asked for by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], and the matter went over until to-day. As I understand, it is now open to such a motion as the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] has made. Unanimous consent was not granted. The matter is now taken from the table for consideration, and any motion that any Senator chooses to make is applicable.

"Mr. FORAKER. I only want to add, if the Senator from Virginia will indulge me to that extent——

"The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Ohio?

"Mr. DANIEL. I do.

"Mr. FORAKER. I have no desire to keep these bills from the Interstate Commerce Committee or the Committee on the Judiciary. I only want to say for myself that there has been no attempt to avoid consideration of the bills, so far as I am aware. The bills were never brought up for consideration in the Interstate Commerce Committee, and if they were considered by the Judiciary Committee in the last Congress I naturally know nothing about it, because I was not then a member of that committee. If the Senate sees fit to leave the bills with the Interstate Commerce Committee I am quite sure they will receive consideration. If it is agreed to take them away from that committee, so far as I am concerned, I shall be very happy, because we are not looking for more work.

"Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

"The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

"Mr. DANIEL. Yes.

"Mr. LODGE. The question of order which I desire to make is, as I understand, first, the motion—if it is to be a matter of motion—I do not know whether or not a motion was made to discharge the committee——

"The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair would ask the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] to kindly state whether he made a motion or a request for unanimous consent.

"Mr. ELKINS. What I made was in the nature of a request. I asked unanimous consent that the committee be discharged. I did not feel at liberty to make a motion, and I did not make a motion. It was a report to the Senate, under the order of business as called by the presiding officer, and under the order of reports of committees I reported that I was authorized to ask that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bills.

"Mr. LODGE. Then, Mr. President, the point of order I make is that no motion has yet been made, and that, if such a motion is made, it must lie over under the rule.

"Mr. DANIEL. If the Senator will allow me, I will inform him that the motion was made on yesterday, and that it has lain over a day under the rule.

"Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator allow me to make an additional suggestion?

"The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

"Mr. DANIEL. Yes.

"Mr. ALDRICH. If it was a motion to refer, that motion is not amendable under the Senate rules.

"Mr. LODGE. But my point of order was that the motion to discharge the committee must in any event, whether considered to-day or to-morrow, be first decided.

"The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts is correct. The motion to discharge the committee must be first decided.

"Mr. ELKINS. Will the Senator from Virginia allow me a word?

"The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

"Mr. DANIEL. I should like to ask the Senator a question while he is on his feet, and then I will yield the floor. Does the Senator think, if these bills were referred back to the Interstate Commerce Committee, that a report could be made upon them in twenty or thirty days?

"Mr. ELKINS. I can hardly say. We have had the subject under consideration and took testimony in the hearings held during the recess. I can not say that within twenty or thirty days we can bring in a general bill on the rate question, but I think in that time we may be able to do so. Now, will the Senator, before he proceeds further, allow me to make a further statement?

"Mr. President, the subject-matter of these two bills is a judicial question. The committee so considered it. Here is a bill to establish the carrier's liability for a fellow-servant's negligence. Railroads are now incorporated in the States. Jurisdiction in these cases is sought under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution where railroads are engaged in interstate traffic. There is a nice distinction as to whether the action in one of the cases should be brought in a State court or in a Federal court. This is an attempt to establish such liability on the part of the carrier, and, under the law it is proposed to pass, to put these causes in the Federal courts.

"That distinction is what moved those members of the committee who were present unanimously to ask that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, in order that the underlying judicial question might be first determined.

"There was no disposition in the committee, nor is there now, to avoid the consideration of this question if it is the judgment of the Senate that the Interstate Commerce Committee is the proper committee to take up and consider it.

"It was considered to some extent at the last session. I am not authorized to state what happened in committee. It would not be proper for me to tell here what happened. As I say, it was to some extent considered then. It was considered during the vacation, and it has been considered at this session. For the reason I have stated, that we thought and still think the question whether such an action should lie in a State court or in a Federal court ought to be disposed of by the Judiciary Committee, and for that reason only, I asked that the Committee on Interstate Commerce be discharged from the further consideration of the subject, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. But if there is any disposition on the part of the Senate, or if it is the judgment of the Senate that this question should be left with the Committee on Interstate Commerce, I assure the Senate it will have prompt consideration.

"Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, when this question came up before the Interstate Commerce Committee I did not object to the motion to refer the bill to the Judiciary Committee, but I did not then know that the bill had prior to that time been before the Judiciary Committee and that that committee had recommended that it be referred to the Interstate Commerce Committee. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] has well said this is a game of battledore and shuttlecock, and in such a game I do not wish to participate.

"Now, with reference to this measure, it is a part of the legislation that is being pressed not only before the Congress of the United States, but in every State of the Union—pressed by the labor unions, the railroad unions, the unions of employees of railroads, and opposed in every legislature in every State in the Union by the railroads themselves. It is one of the fruitful causes of that activity in politics by railroad corporations which is so much deplored, and it is with reference to diminishing that activity in politics that I have urged before the Senate that we enter upon a comprehensive plan of incorporating the interstate railroads under a national incorporation act. If we can do that, we can cover this question of the insurance of employees against injuries, whether those injuries are the result of the negligence of the corporation itself or whether they are the result of the negligence of a fellow-employee.

"Now we are legislating piecemeal every day and every month and every year upon the question of interstate commerce. We are now legislating with reference to rates——

"Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President——

"The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Illinois?

"Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

"Mr. HOPKINS. I trust the Senator does not propose to defer action on these bills which are now up for discussion here to-day until the nationalization of railroads under the plan suggested by the Senator.

"Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not propose to defer the one. What I wish to do is to accelerate the other, and I insist upon it that we are prepared now to enter upon the question of the national incorporation of railroads——

"Mr. HOPKINS. Why combine the two? Why not let each stand on its merits?

"Mr. NEWLANDS. And that within a month, if the Senator will permit me to say it, a bill can be reported to the Congress of the United States for the national incorporation of railroads which will cover every question of this piecemeal legislation that is now occupying the attention of Congress, taking up its time unnecessarily. We have within easy reach in a national incorporation act a solution for all these vexed questions.

"What was one of the proposals of the national incorporation act which I have suggested, in addition to the question of the control of capitalization, in addition to the question of return upon capital, in addition to the question of a fair, comprehensive rule of taxation that would apply throughout the United States? One of the propositions was that a certain percentage of the gross receipts of all railroads engaged in interstate commerce should be put into an insurance fund, that fund to be responsive to the demands of employees who received injuries in the service, which is the public service.

"The gross receipts of these railroads are $2,000,000,000 a year. If you set aside 1 per cent of the gross receipts, it will amount to $20,000,000 annually. Set that aside in a fund in the Treasury, to be invested in approved securities, and then allow the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix the rules under which payments shall be made to the men receiving the injuries. It is a brutal thing to compel the employee receiving an injury, or his heirs if he is killed in an accident, to resort to the courts, to employ counsel, to submit to the law's delay, in order to recover damages. There ought to be some easier and speedier method of securing justice to these people who serve the public in this great service, and the entire expense of it should be fastened upon the public in the shape of a transportation charge.

"As it is to-day, the public, in freights and fares, pay the railroads the $2,000,000,000 which they receive. The public pay the operating expense. The public pay the taxes. The public pay interest upon the debt. The public pay dividends to the stockholders. Why should not the public pay 1 per cent more—only one-hundredth of the present receipts—into a fund in order to protect these men who are engaged in the service of the public in a semihazardous occupation? Such a percentage should be regarded as part of the fixed charges against railroad corporations, like taxes and insurance, and rates should be so fixed as to cover this charge in addition to the other operating expenses and fixed charges of the companies.

"Mr. HOPKINS. I am not sure I understand the position of the Senator from Nevada, and for that reason I desire to ask him a question. Is it his position, relating to the nationalization of railroads, that if an employee—a brakeman or a conductor or flagman—on the Pennsylvania Railroad is injured and loses a leg or an arm, instead of the railroad company being liable for the damage, the general public shall pay it?

"Mr. NEWLANDS. My proposition is this: That the public pays the entire income, the gross receipts of the railroads; that the entire transportation of the country is imposed upon the business and the transportation of the country; that $2,000,000,000 is received from the public for freights and fares. What I insist upon is that 1 per cent of that sum shall be set aside in an insurance fund for the protection of employees receiving injuries.

"Mr. HOPKINS. Is the theory that the Senator presents on the question of damages that if an employee of a road in Pennsylvania or in Ohio is injured that that road has no more to do with paying damages than a road in New England or in California?

"Mr. NEWLANDS. No; it has no more to do with the payment of that damage than a road in California or in New England. That is my proposition.

"Mr. HOPKINS. In view of that——

"Mr. NEWLANDS. My proposition is to take the whole subject-matter out of litigation——

"Mr. HOPKINS. Yes.

"Mr. NEWLANDS. And to do away with the necessity——

"Mr. HOPKINS. In view of that——

"Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator will permit me to conclude——

"Mr. HOPKINS. I desire to ask the Senator from Nevada, if he is a friend of the employees of railroad companies and desires to see that justice is done them, whether it would not be better to consider these bills which are now being discussed in the Senate separately and on their merits than to delay them until this plan which is now advocated by the Senator from Nevada becomes a law?

"Mr. NEWLANDS. I have already answered that question. I propose to delay nothing. I do not propose to delay the consideration of the bill which has been presented by the railroad employees of the country. I do not wish to delay action upon the bill that is intended to regulate interstate rates. All I do suggest is that contemporaneously with that action and as a part of it we can within the next month present a national incorporation act which will embrace all these questions, and which will do away with this friction between the public and the railroads, between the employees and the railroads, and which will settle all these questions in a rational, comprehensive, and scientific way.

"Mr. HOPKINS. I dislike to take up the time of the Senator, but he says it can all be done in a month.

"Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

"Mr. HOPKINS. The Senator means it could all be done in a month if everybody approved of his plan in its comprehensive outline and in its details.

"Mr. NEWLANDS. It could be done if that were accepted.

"Mr. HOPKINS. The Senator from Nevada has been discussing this subject somewhat before the Interstate Commerce Committee. I should like to ask him if there is any prospect of that committee presenting his bill to the Senate within the near future?

"Mr. NEWLANDS. I can not say. I see evidence of progress. Let me say that thus far almost every man who talks to me upon the subject says that the measure is all right, but it is ahead of the time.

My answer is that if a thing is right, now is the time always; and this thing is right.

"I ask what additional questions does the national incorporation act involve?

"Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

"The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

"Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

"Mr. SPOONER. I recollect that the Senator and I had a little discussion one day in a general way on his proposition, and I at that time was troubled by one phase of it, and that was the theory upon which the Senator was to arrange to take out of the States' power of taxation and regulation transportation so far as it was intrastate. Has the Senator satisfied himself that it is within the constitutional capacity of Congress to pass a national railroad incorporation act requiring the interstate corporations of the country to organize under it, and to control independently of the State the purely State business which such railroad corporations would do?

"Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes; I will say to the Senator that I have given a great deal of consideration to that question.

"Mr. SPOONER. I know that.

"Mr. NEWLANDS. It has not been decided by the courts whether or not the National Congress in incorporating an interstate railway can exempt it from State regulations as to intrastate rates. But the courts have not decided to the contrary, and in the case of the Texas Pacific Railway, to which the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] referred the other day, they have determined that it is an open question; and the Senator from Texas objected to the national incorporation act which I proposed because he feared that the Supreme Court would finally determine that a national corporation chosen as a national instrumentality for the purpose of carrying out a national purpose, would be freed from State regulation as to purely State commerce. That was his fear. My reply to him was that I hoped that that fear would be realized; that I believed that as interstate commerce constitutes three-fourths of the business of the entire country, and in some States, like Nebraska, embraces nineteen-twentieths of the business of the State, the greater sovereignty ought to create the machine that is to do all the people's business, and that it is unwise and impolitic to burden it with State legislation either as to taxation or regulation; that the public interest requires simplicity in taxation and in regulation, and that the varying systems of taxation and regulation embodied in the legislation of eight or ten or fifteen States through which an interstate railroad system passes tends to complexity and confusion.

"Mr. SPOONER. I inferred from the observation of the Senator to the effect that this national incorporation act accomplishing a great reform could be passed within a month; that the Senator had become, upon further reflection and examination, satisfied that there was no constitutional impediment to his plan, through a national incorporation act, to entirely extricate the railroad transportation of the country from State taxation and State supervision, which is one of the objects the Senator very clearly and eloquently set forth in support of his proposition.

"Mr. NEWLANDS. But that is not the only object, let me state.

"Mr. SPOONER. I know; but if this is a constitutional impediment, it could hardly be removed by the passage of an act of Congress. It would require something beyond that. It would require an amendment to the Constitution. I have not been able quite to make up my mind that the States can be compelled, by an act of Congress, to surrender to a national corporation the transportation arising in the State and ending in the State. Has the Senator?

"Mr. NEWLANDS. No; I have not; but the bill can be made permissive or it can be made coercive. In the latter case only will the question to which the Senator has referred arise. But permissive legislation will, in my judgment, accomplish great good.

"Mr. DANIEL. I dislike to interrupt this interesting discussion, if the Senator desires to go on, but we are very anxious to get this measure acted upon before 2 o'clock. There have been so many interruptions that I fear the Senator may be detained and we may not get action on the motion. If our friends will abbreviate their curiosity till after this motion is disposed of, it will be very agreeable. I do not mean this in the sense of a rebuke, of course.

"Mr. NEWLANDS. Of course I do not wish to delay the Senate in the consideration of this motion, but I should like to answer very briefly—it will not take me more than five minutes, unless I am interrupted—the interrogatories of the Senator from Wisconsin, because I think it is appropriate that the answer should go into the RECORD now.

"I will say to the Senator from Wisconsin that while I should hope that in the end corporations organized under a national incorporation act, doing an interstate business amounting to three-fourths of the business of the country, should not be subject to State legislation either as to taxation or regulation, yet I should favor a national incorporation act even if the corporations were subject to both. I do not regard the regulation of intrastate rates as a very serious matter, for it involves so little of the commerce of each one of these corporations engaged in interstate commerce, and even though the legislation of the State may be somewhat embarrassing, it can not be so embarrassing as to counterbalance the great advantages which I think would be obtained by the scientific consolidation of roads under a national charter.

"Now, so far as the question of taxation is concerned, I have not the slightest doubt, inasmuch as the power to tax involves the power to destroy, and as that taxation is to be imposed upon the entire instrumentality, in its completeness, used by Congress for the transaction of interstate commerce, that if Congress decides upon a fixed rule of taxation, uniform, reasonable, and just throughout the entire country, permitting the States to collect the tax upon that rule, the Supreme Court would determine that Congress has the power to fix such a rule.

"We find that in the case of the national banks to-day the Congress of the United States fixes the rules of taxation and the States have to conform to it.

"Mr. SPOONER. The Senator speaks of Congress permitting the States to collect this tax. Does he mean that the States are to collect taxes levied by Congress; that the States are to become agents of the National Government for the collection of taxes?

"Mr. NEWLANDS. No; I do not propose that the National Government shall collect the taxes, but that the States shall.

"Mr. SPOONER. But the rule is to be fixed by Congress?

"Mr. NEWLANDS. The rule can be prescribed by Congress.

"I go further than that. I think Congress can, if it chooses, absolutely exempt these corporations, as national instrumentalities, from all taxation, national or State; and as the greater must include the less, it necessarily follows that the Government can lay down the rule for the taxation by the States of these corporations engaged in interstate commerce; and I cite the Senator to the case of the national banks, which are national instrumentalities, and the Senator will find in the law incorporating national banks that the United States lays down the rule for their taxation by the States.

"Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

"The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

"Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

"Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Nevada permit me to suggest, in reference to the bills now under consideration, that the railroad employees are not here asking for the relief the Senator from Nevada suggests? They are simply asking that they be put on a par, in respect to injuries received, with the rights given them in many of the States. Some of our Federal courts hold that a man engaged in the railroad service assumes the risk of the service, and hence that there is no liability. Then again they have extended the doctrine of fellow-servant, holding that where an injury occurs through a mistake or ignorance of a fellow-servant, there is no liability.

"Now, in many of the Western States—and I am not familiar with the situation in all the States—the rule is that if an injury happens to an employee engaged in the railway service without his negligence contributing thereto, although it may have occurred through the negligence of a fellow-servant, as it is called, or although it may result from a defective machine or other matters pertaining to it, the railroad company is liable. This is not a question that belongs appropriately to the Judiciary Committee. It is simply a question of public policy—whether the Federal Government will accord to these railroad employees the same rights and privileges in respect to injuries that are accorded them by the laws of many of the States. That is the only question, and in respect to that question of public policy I should think the Committee on Interstate Commerce is as appropriate a committee as any. It is not a question involving legal technicalities or legal matters. It is simply a question whether it is right and just to make the railroads liable in these cases. I submit that the committee which deals with interstate commerce and all that pertains to it is the appropriate committee.

"Now, when the railroad employees ask for the relief the Senator from Nevada suggests, that, I think, will be the proper time to consider that question. But they are not asking for that now. The question is whether we will give them the relief they ask for now in these bills or something of that kind.

"Mr. NEWLANDS. I trust the Senator from Minnesota understands that I am not opposing any fair law for determining the liability of corporations engaged in interstate commerce for accidents to employees. I am simply pointing out what I regard as a better method of accomplishing the same result, one more humane to the employees, one less costly to the employees, one that takes this whole question out of politics—and it is now in politics in every State in the Union—and one that settles the matter for all time.

"I do not wish the Senate to understand for a moment that I am going to delay the consideration of this bill, or that I oppose its consideration by the Interstate Commerce Committee, but I do say that we are taking up this whole question of interstate commerce in the most fragmentary way, by piecemeal legislation, and that by the time we get through we shall find that years of legislation will have covered almost every inch of ground that would be covered by a national incorporation act passed now.

"In the interest of the public, in the interest of the railroads themselves, and in the interest of the employees of the railroads, it does seem to me that we should have some comprehensive adjustment of this question that will prevent the overcapitalization of these great consolidated railroads; that will put them under some public control; that will fix the returns on capital; that will lay down a scientific rule of taxation; that will provide some humane method of compensating men who have received injuries or the heirs of men who have died as the result of injury in the service of the great railroad companies.

"I insist upon it that now is as good a time as one year or two years hence, and that we will save the time of the Congress of the United States if, while considering this great regulation bill, we also attach to it simple provisions—and you will be amazed how simple the legislation is when your mind is directed to it—permitting the consolidation of railroads by national corporations under the supervision of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

"Right now many of the consolidations of the country which have been eminently beneficial to the country are being threatened. In the House the other day a resolution was passed inquiring into the merger accomplished by the Pennsylvania Railroad, a merger which it is said has practically eliminated competition in the entire area covered by the trunk lines—the New York Central, the Pennsylvania Railroad, the Baltimore and Ohio, the Chesapeake and Ohio, and the Norfolk and Western.

"Mr. KEAN. Do I understand the Senator from Nevada to say the New York Central and the Pennsylvania and all those roads are merged?

"Mr. NEWLANDS. I said that a resolution had passed the House inquiring into such a merger.

"Now, for my part, I believe that these consolidations are wise, provided they are entered into with the approval of some commission representing the country at large, such commission controlling the capitalization and preventing overcapitalization. I believe that unrestrained and uncontrolled and undirected combination is bad. I believe that restrained and controlled and directed combination is good.

"As a matter of fact, we know that in almost every section of the country competition is being eliminated by combinations that have taken place—many of them, under the doctrine of the Northern Securities decision, in absolute violation of law. It would be a great misfortune if the entire country were thrown into confusion by decisions annulling the combinations which have been already accomplished.

"It will not do to wait till a crisis comes. We should consider this question now instead of waiting till the courts destroy and dismember these combinations and reduce the entire transportation of the country to confusion, and then by legislation take up the fragments and endeavor to mold them into legalized combinations.

"It is a well-known fact, whether a merger has been accomplished or not, that competition has been practically eliminated in the entire trunk-line area. It is an absolute fact in ten Southern States that competition has been practically eliminated by the mergers that have been accomplished through the Southern Railway system, the Atlantic Coast Line system, and the Illinois Central Railroad system, those three systems having combined now 26,000 miles of railroad out of less than 30,000 miles of railroad in ten or twelve Southern States. Mergers accomplished under the law of a single State, yet effectual in the commerce of many States.

"I am admonished that we are approaching the close of the morning hour, Mr. President, and I will not pursue this line further. I shall take the opportunity, however, at a later day to say something on this subject.

"Mr. PATTERSON obtained the floor.

"Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

"The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Georgia?

"Mr. PATTERSON. Yes; because it was my desire to get the floor not for the purpose of discussing this question. I want to discuss the resolution of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] and give my views, which are not quite in harmony with the views of my colleagues upon this side of the Chamber, on the matter of the Monroe doctrine, the Santo Domingo treaty, and the pending arrangement between the President and Santo Domingo. But it is very desirable, I think, that this motion should be disposed of in some way, and I yield the floor for the time being to the Senator from Georgia, to resume it when I can.

"The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia will proceed.

"Mr. BACON. Mr. President, as there has been no distinct statement by any member of the Judiciary Committee who was a member at the time the bill was reported back to the Senate with a request that the committee be discharged and that it be then referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, I desire to state, so far as I myself understood the action of the committee, the ground upon which it was based. It was not from any disposition to shirk a duty nor from any disposition to engage in the game of shuttlecock and battledoor, to which allusion has more than once been made.

"The bill, as it appeared to the committee, is an extremely far-reaching measure, one, so far as I know, absolutely novel in its provisions and in the purposes which it seeks to accomplish. If it were a bill which sought to fix the rule of the liability of railroad companies to its employees in the District of Columbia or in the Territories there would be no question that it would be a bill which should go to the Judiciary Committee. But the bill goes very much farther than that. In fact, that feature of it is infinitesimal compared with that which it embraces in its totality.

"It is a bill which proposes to fix the rule of the liability of railroad companies for damages to employees not simply in the District of Columbia or in the Territories, but the rule of damages in all cases and in all jurisdictions of railroads which are engaged in interstate commerce, and as almost every railroad in the United Sttes of any consequence is engaged in interstate commerce it may be said to be practically a bill which proposes to take away from the State the right to fix what shall be the rule of damages in case of an injury to an employee by a railroad company in that State and to have a rule of damages which shall be enacted by the Congress of the United States applied to every railroad in the United States that is engaged in interstate commerce. This would also necessarily devolve upon the Federal courts in each State the jurisdiction to try all cases against railroad companies in suits against them to recover damages for personal injuries. The magnitude of that question must strike everyone without any comment upon it whatever. The Senate will percelve that the great question presented by the bill is not the question, as suggested, simply whether this is a correct rule of damages, but whether or not under the interstate-commerce provision of the Constitution it is a matter within the jurisdiction of the Congress of the United States to pass a law which shall fix the rule of liability for damages in all cases in the United States in suits for personal injuries to employees.

"It was for that reason, Mr. President, that the Judiciary Committee thought that a bill involving a question which hinged, and necessarily turned, upon the question whether it was a matter within the interstate-commerce provision of the Constitution should be with the Interstate Commerce Committee rather than with the Judiciary Committee. The Judiciary Committee considered this question in two sessions of Congress, and the then chairman of the committee, the former senior Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. Hoar, was very decidedly of the opinion that is was a question which should be determined, or rather which should be examined upon and reported to the Senate, by the Interstate Commerce Committee rather than by the Judiciary Committee.

"I will state for the information of the Senate that, so far as the interests of my State are concerned, the bill would have very little effect, because the first two sections of the bill, which are the important ones, and which more immediately relate to the question of liability, are now substantially the law of Georgia. That is the fixed law of Georgia, and I approve of that law as the law of my State. But as to whether or not the Congress of the United States shall hereafter have jurisdiction to fix the question of what shall be the liability of a railroad company in California, or in Maine, or in Louisiana, or Texas, or Pennsylvania, and whether each of these States and all other States shall thereafter surrender the right to fix the question of the liability of railroads for such damages, and shall surrender the jurisdiction of the State courts to try such cases and turn them all over to the Federal courts, is an immense question.

"The Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL], who is the author of the bill, says to me that the States would not surrender it. Of course I would hesitate to differ from him on that subject, because he has given it very much more thought than I have. I have simply been guided by what I think is the plain reading of the bill and what I know to have been the view taken of it by the Judiciary Committee. I will read it for the purpose of seeing whether or not I am correct, and I will take but a minute; I see the time is nearly out before the expiration of the morning hour. The language is this:

"'That every common carrier by railroad engaged in trade or commerce in the District of Columbia, or in any Territory of the United States, or between the several States, or between any Territory and another, or between any Territory or Territories and any State or States, or the District of Columbia, or with foreign nations, or between the District of Columbia and any State or States or foreign nations, shall be liable to any of its employees who are occupied in such trade or commerce, or, in the case of his death, to his heirs at law, for all damages which may result from the negligence or mismanagement of any of its officers, agents, or employees, or by reason of any defect or insufficiency in its cars, engines, appliances, machinery, track, roadbed, ways, or works.'

"That, as I have said, is the law of Georgia now. So I am not arguing as to anything which would affect my State or change the law from what it now is, except in so far as it would take the jurisdiction in all such cases from our State courts and confer the same upon the Federal courts, which would be a great hardship on the railroad employees. But it seems to me that that language would confer upon the Congress of the United States the right to legislate as to those matters, as to any railroads engaged in interstate commerce, and it could not be a concurrent jurisdiction between the Congress of the United States and the several States to legislate upon the same subject.

"But I do not propose to discuss the question now. I simply rose for the purpose of suggesting the reasons why the Judiciary Committee thought the bill ought to go to the Interstate Commerce Committee. It was because it involved a great interstate-commerce question and must hinge upon the decision whether it was within the provision of the Constitution giving to Congress the right to legislate with reference to interstate commerce. I wished also to say that I think it ought to remain with the Committee on Interstate Commerce and that the Judiciary Committee was correct in the suggestion upon which the Senate acted in referring it to that committee.

"Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

"Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, if there will be a vote taken upon the motion of the Senator from West Virginia now, I will yield for that purpose, but I will not yield for any other purpose.

"Mr. TILLMAN. We can not get a vote until after I am heard. I have been sitting here for about an hour in order to get in. I did not care to rush roughshod over others.

"The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

"Mr. PATTERSON. It is perfectly manifest that this matter can not be disposed of this afternoon.

"Mr. DANIEL. Let it go over until to-morrow.

"Mr. PATTERSON. Therefore I desire to hold the floor until the time for placing the regular business of the session before the Senate arrives, that I may have the floor at the conclusion of the morning business to-morrow.

"Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I should like to ask from the Chair the present parliamentary status of this matter of reference.

"The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] that the Committee on Interstate Commerce be discharged from the further consideration of the bills and that they be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. Two questions are involved, and the first question is on the motion to discharge the committee.

"Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Before the motion is put, as a member of the Judiciary Committee I wish to say with reference to the merits of the bill or any other that it was only upon due consideration in the last Congress the Judiciary Committee came to the conclusion, and so reported through its chairman to the Senate, that the proper jurisdiction of the bill belonged to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. They did that after consideration, and did it with no desire to evade responsibility or to shirk work. That was the position of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary at that time, and it is the position held by some members of the committee at this time. I make that statement simply as an explanation.

"Mr. ELKINS. Will the Senator from Colorado allow me just one word?

"The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

"Mr. PATTERSON. Yes.

"Mr. ELKINS. After the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], who is a member of the Interstate Commerce Committee, has an opportunity to be heard, with the consent of the members of the committee, which has been obtained, I will ask unanimous consent to withdraw my request. But I will not do so until after the Senator from South Carolina has had an opportunity to be heard. I want to give notice to the Senator from Colorado what my purpose is.

"Mr. PATTERSON. I did not understand the Senator from West Virginia.

"Mr. ELKINS. I stated that after the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], who is a member of the Interstate Commerce Committee, has had an opportunity to be heard, I will ask unanimous consent to withdraw the request I made and leave the two bills in the Interstate Commerce Committee. That will dispose of the question. But I do not want to make that request until after the Senator from South Carolina has been heard, if the Senator from Colorado will yield to him.

"Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, I did intend to address the Senate upon the subject that has engrossed a good deal of its time and that involves questions as momentous as those that are involved not so much in the resolution of the Senator from South Carolina as in cognate questions that have been referred to and discussed and enlarged upon by Senators upon both sides of the Chamber."

On April 2, 1906, the House bill H. R. 239 passed the House, and upon its receipt by the Senate on April 3 Senator MARTIN of Virginia made this statement:

"EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY BILL.

"H. H. 239. An act relating to liability of common carriers by railroads in the District of Columbia and Territories and common carriers by railroads engaged in commerce between the States and between the States and foreign nations to their employees was read twice by its title.

"Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, that is the bill known as the 'employers' liability bill.' Of course it will go to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. I simply desire to call the attention of the committee to the bill and to the fact that I made a laborious effort during the last session of Congress to get a report from the Senate committee. I hope the committee will give prompt attention to the bill, so that the Senate may have a report one way or the other on the measure.

"The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce."

It was then referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and as yet no report has been made by that committee on either it or the Senate bills.

Very truly, yours, H. R. FULLER,

Legislative Representative Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen, Order of Railway Conductors, and Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, with reference to the pending amendment, I wish to say that I shall vote for it, although I have not had an opportunity to scrutinize it carefully. But I shall vote for it, because if it goes into the bill it will go into conference, and if it is at all defective the whole matter will be properly shaped there and submitted to the determination of Congress.

So far as concerns the Interstate Commerce Committee, of which I am a member, I feel that the committee has not fully discharged the duty that was imposed upon it by the resolution which was adopted by the Senate. That resolution——

Mr. KEAN. I only want to say that if the committee has been negligent no member of it has been more so than the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I hardly think that that statement is justified by the record. I have not charged the committee with negligence, nor do I charge myself with negligence. But what I do say is that the committee has not discharged the full duty imposed upon it by the Senate in the resolution which instructed it to report a bill for the regulation of interstate commerce, as that resolution included the framing of a bill popularly known as an "employers' liability bill."

I wish to say further that when the bill which passed the House came to the Senate committee for consideration I voted for its report to the Senate. So that so far as I am concerned, while I make no reflection upon the committee or its members, I simply wish to say that my full duty has been discharged.

THE PRESENT LAW A BURDEN ON THE EMPLOYEE.

Now, with reference to the amendment itself, I wish to say that I have always thought that this was a brutal way of dealing with the entire subject. When an employee is injured he must bring suit against the railroad company. He must employ a lawyer, to whom he gives an agreement entitling him probably to 50 per cent of the judgment. Railroads make a business of contesting almost all these cases, for they fear if they do not they will be subjected to infinite litigation.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am pleased to say to the Senator from Nevada that the New England roads do not contest these cases as a rule, but generally settle them out of court.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am very glad to know that; and yet I cannunderstand how a railroad, as a matter of settled policy, would contest these cases, for oftentimes the suits are exaggerated as to the amount claimed; the services of unscrupulous lawyers are obtained; a popular prejudice is aroused; and as a result, the railroads often feel themselves compelled to defend all cases lest the settlement of one would only be an invitation for the commencement of another. So, also, when a man is killed, his representatives are compelled to sue, and they go through the same long and weary process, failing in proper relief to the employee or his representatives, and resulting largely in vexation and harassment to the corporation.

CONGRESS SHOULD RECOGNIZE THE HAZARDOUS NATURE OF THE EMPLOYMENT.

I believe that the Congress of the United States, in dealing with interstate commerce, should recognize the hazardous nature of the occupation, should recognize these injuries as incident to the occupation, and should provide a pension and insurance fund by these corporations which will automatically take care of these cases and relieve the courts of their determination.

THE RAILROADS SHOULD BE COMPELLED TO RESERVE A PENSION AND INSURANCE FUND.

Mr. President, the Supreme Court has determined that in the regulation of rates the corporations are entitled, after the payment of operating expenses, the payment of taxes, the payment of fixed charges, to receive a fair return upon the value of their property. I see no reason why corporations should not be compelled to set aside a certain percentage of their gross receipts, and put that percentage into a pension and insurance fund, out of which men who are injured and the families of men who are killed may be reimbursed. A charge of 1 per cent upon the gross receipts of all these corporations would mean $20,000,000 annually. A charge of a half per cent would mean $10,000,000 annually. Either of these sums invested in a pension and insurance fund in good interest-bearing securities under the supervision of the Interstate Commerce Commission would take care of these employees for all time.

THE FUND SHOULD BE CHARGED TO OPERATING EXPENSES.

Now, that charge should not be imposed in whole or in part either on the employees or the shareholders of the corporation. It should be frankly imposed upon the transportation of the country as one of the expenses of operation. Then the Interstate Commerce Commission itself, in determining what is a fair return upon the value of the roperty of such a corporation engaged in interstate commerce, would be compelled to allow as the operating expenses not only the salaries and wages of employees, but the moneys paid into this section and insurance fund. That is the rational and humane way of dealing with this entire question. It takes the employees out of court; it relieves the carriers of litigation. It recognizes the humanity of the situation, and makes the entire transportation of the country maintain this accident, pension, and insurance fund, for what is regarded and ought to be regarded as one of the risks incident to employment in the public service—risks that entitle the employees or their families to compensation in the shape of substantial and immediate relief when such employees are injured, disabled, or killed.

This is the system that is pursued in Germany. It is the system that is pursued in France. It is the system that is voluntarily pursued by some of the corporations in this country, though with the undesirable feature of contribution by the employees themselves. It is the system which ought to be made a matter of obligation upon all carriers engaged in the interstate commerce. If we should take hold of this matter properly, through a national incorporation act, we could, in the very charter of every national company, provide for this pension and insurance fund and reach this entire situation.

But, Mr. President, Congress is not yet prepared to take up the national incorporation of railroads, with all its attendant provisions relating to the safety of the employees and the creation of an insurance and pension fund, and hence, although I have not critically examined this amendment, not having had the opportunity to do so, I shall vote for it as a step in advance, trusting that whatever defects there may be in the amendment will be remedied in conference and by the action of both Houses upon the conference report.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, I think it is due the Senate to state that the Interstate Commerce Committee has now before it for consideration a bill substantially of the character of the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

It has adopted two sections of the bill. It is the House bill that came over some weeks ago, and was referred to the committee. But we have not had time to conclude its consideration.

I would ask the Senator from Wisconsin if he has seen the bill pending before the committee?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will say to the Senator from West Virginia, that I have seen the bill pending before the committee, and that I am informed the committee has agreed upon a report on the House bill. I have the House bill before me with the amendments which the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate have adopted to it, and those amendments practically eviscerate the House bill. I have them here, and should be glad to have them incorporated in the RECORD.

Mr. ELKINS. Let me see them. [After a pause.] The amendments referred to by the Senator from Wisconsin and which have been interlined in this copy of the bill were so interlined when it was in charge of the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN], and the amendments which have been adopted were such amendments as he proposed. The amendments to the third section have not been considered for want of time.

I think it is fair to say, although I do not know definitely, that the committee will agree to the House bill with perhaps one or two other amendments to meet this question. I have not had time to read the Senator's amendment which is before the Senate. I suppose it is substantially the same. I hardly think the amendments take all the good out of the bill, as suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin. The bill as it came from the House with the amendments already made by the committee is a very good bill. I call the attention of the junior Senator from Mississippi to those amendments.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask unanimous consent to have the bill which I sent across to the Senator from West Virginia printed in the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. MCLAURIN. Mr. President, I do not think it is proper to have the bill which the Committee on Interstate Commerce have under consideration printed in the RECORD until the committee makes a report upon the bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If there is objection, I will ask to have the bill returned to me.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin withdraws his request.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, there is another reason why the bill should not be incorporated in the RECORD in the way proposed, and that is, although I understand there was action taken by the committee in the way of amendments, it is not final. Some members of the committee gave notice at the meeting of the committee that they would ask the privilege of further consideration on that very question.

Mr. MCLAURIN. I so understood it and so remember the action of the committee, and that is one reason why the bill with the interlineations should not be inserted in the RECORD, because it is not the action of the committee.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I ask the indulgence of the Senate for a moment. Regarding this amendment, I desire to say that I am now and have been for years in favor of remedial legislation along these lines. Whether this amendment is in proper form I am not prepared to say, but there is one thing I am clear about, and that is that it has no appropriate place on this bill. This is a bill to regulate interstate commerce, and we do not want to inject into it a proposition entirely foreign to that subject. I am ready to support and vote for a proper measure of this kind. I am not hostile to the proposition of granting employees of railroads relief in this direction if the measure is properly formulated. But I think it has no place on this bill, and I believe that in making this statement I am voicing the sentiment of many of my colleagues in this Chamber.

Mr. ELKINS. I think at the next meeting of the committee the committee will be able to report the House bill with some amendments. I agree with the Senator from Minnesota that the subject has no place on this bill. I think the House and the Committee on Interstate Commerce can be trusted to frame a bill, and I think they are quite equal——

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, has not the Senator from West Virginia spoken once on this subject?

Mr. FRYE. Yes; he has.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks the Senator from West Virginia is out of order.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, it will be recalled that the subject-matter of this amendment has been before the Senate once before at this session in a complaint of the Senator from Virginia that a bill of this character had been traveling back and forth from one committee to another, none of them apparently willing to take it up and consider it, and that finally it got back to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. That committee has been so engrossed with other matters, mainly the bill under consideration here, that it apparently has not had the time or been willing—I can not say which—to give this matter the attention it deserves.

I at first was opposed to this legislation, because, as I stated to my friends in South Carolina who had written me in regard to it, urging me to vote for the bill, it puts the jurisdiction of such cases in the Federal courts, and suits for damages in the Federal courts in our State (Senators are probably well aware now of my opinion on such matters) would largely be determined against the persons seeking redress for damages. But having been appealed to by those who are interested——

Mr. DANIEL. Will the Senator from South Carolina yield to me for a moment?

Mr. TILLMAN. I should like to get through, and then the Senator can go on.

Mr. DANIEL. I merely wish to make a suggestion here.

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. DANIEL. Is it not true that the State courts would still have jurisdiction?

Mr. TILLMAN. I am not lawyer enough to answer the Senator.

Mr. DANIEL. I think so. That is my understanding.

Mr. TILLMAN. I therefore decided that I would vote for this measure to come out of the committee. We have had meeting after meeting called to consider this bill, and for one reason and another nothing was done except to talk over it and interline it some and to suggest amendments. I therefore am now ready to vote to put it on this bill rather than to get no bill, and while we may get something out of the committee, I fear unless we put it in this legislation it will be hung up to dry somewhere and die in conference or never get through.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, if the Committee on Interstate Commerce have practically agreed upon a proposition of this kind——

Mr. TILLMAN. They have not.

Mr. BAILEY. Then it would save time and trouble to incorporate it in this bill. If they have not agreed, and if any important details of the bill are in dispute, then probably we could settle them as well here as they could be settled in the committee room.

This legislation would not have been necessary a few years ago. For well-nigh a century the Federal courts sitting in the various States administered the law of fellow-servant according to the law of the States; and if that were still the rule Congress might safely remit these questions and all similar questions for adjudication according to the laws of the several States. But something like ten years ago, or probably something like fifteen years ago, the Supreme Court of the United States, in the celebrated case of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company v. John Baugh, refused to follow the fellow-servant doctrine as laid down by the supreme court of the State of Ohio, the case coming from that State, and they held that there is a general law of fellow-servant obtaining throughout the United States. That doctrine once established, it now becomes necessary for Congress to control it or else leave it with its wide and, as I think, improper application announced in that case.

So it seems to me that we simply in this practically go back to the rule as it existed before the decision in the John Baugh case, and I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President, I would much prefer that a measure of this character might be considered in a separate bill, and I think it properly should be so considered. I doubt if anyone, or, at least, if many have had an opportunity to give that consideration to the provisions of this amendment that their importance demands.

Personally I am in favor of legislation doing away with the common-law rule in regard to fellow-servants. In my State that rule has been changed, and I was a member of the legislature of the State making the change when the law was enacted and voted for it. I favor the principle of the amendment. It ought not properly to be considered here, but it seems to me that the committee having in charge the fellow-servant bill should have reported it before this. It has not done so. Probably it has not been able to give it the necessary consideration. Be that as it may, the bill has not been reported to the Senate. It may or it may not be reported soon. I do not know, not being a member of that committee, what the probability is in that regard, but I do know that in my judgment some measure embodying the principle of the proposed amendment should be enacted. From a rather hasty reading of the proposed amendment, I am doubtful if it will afford the relief desired and expected by its friends, but in lieu of something better I shall support it. I am not going to vote against the principle, and I shall vote for the amendment rather than take chances of securing no legislation on the subject. I regret it has not come before the Senate as a separate measure, so that we might separately consider it. Still, I think the men who work on the railroads and risk their lives every day in endeavoring to protect the lives of the traveling public should have this reasonable and necessary protection. The extent to which the doctrine of fellow-servant has been carried in some forums has led to very great injustice. Hence I favor the adoption of this amendment.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, I do not desire to say much about the pending amendment. The Committee on Interstate Commerce has the employers' liability bill before it. I believe that is the name by which it is known. It is House bill 239, according to my recollection. The committee has not been neglectful in the consideration of the bill, but has, I think, diligently considered it, and has given hearings to those who have favored the bill and those who have opposed it. There was an argument made by attorneys who were opposing the bill as to the constitutionality of one of the sections—section 3. The committee has agreed upon all the other sections of the bill, with certain amendments, and at the last meeting of the committee it was considering section 3 at the time when the hour arrived for the meeting of the Senate, and the committee had, therefore, to rise. I think, from the expressions that were made by the members of the committee, there is a practical agreement upon that section.

Mr. President, I favor any legislation that will protect the employees not only of railroads, but of any other common carriers. I would make this apply to all common carriers engaged in interstate commerce, if we have the authority to do so, whether they be common carriers by rail or by water or by any other method. But I do not think that that bill ought to be incorporated into the bill we have now under consideration. The bill we are considering will have enough load to carry without incorporating into it bodily entire bills that have been introduced, and especially bills that have been introduced into the House and have passed the House and come to the Senate and have been considered by a Senate committee.

There is another thing about this. I believe that all the evils could be remedied by a short provision requiring the United States courts, in cases of personal injuries or in cases of controversies between citizens and common carriers engaged in the business of interstate commerce, to be controlled and governed in their judgments by the law of the State where the injury complained of occurred.

If the case referred to by the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY]—the case of Baugh v. The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company—laid down a different doctrine from that, then surely if Congress has a right to enact the legislation that is sought to be enacted by this amendment, Congress will have the right to change the rule laid down by the Supreme Court, because the Supreme Court was not then passing upon any statute, and Congress can provide that the Federal courts shall be governed by the laws of the State where the injury occurred in the trial of all these cases. I do not claim to be accurate in my recollection of the case of Baugh v. The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, because it has been a long time since I have read it.

I will support any bill that is before Congress for the purpose of giving a proper remedy——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. McLAURIN. When I shall have finished this sentence.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Very well.

Mr. McLAURIN. I shall support any bill giving a proper remedy to any employee and put that employee upon the broadest ground for relief against any common carrier, but I will not support a measure that undertakes to incorporate into this bill a bill that will serve to load it and make it more doubtful of final enactment. Now I will yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator from Mississippi is a member of the general committee and also a member of the subcommittee having the bill in charge, I believe.

Mr. KEAN. He is not a member of the subcommittee.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Is he not a member of the subcommittee?

Mr. McLAURIN. I am not a member of any subcommittee. There was a subcommittee appointed, but I am not a member of it and have not been.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. But the Senator is a member of the general committee?

Mr. McLAURIN. I am a member of the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I would not have interrupted the Senator, only I understood that he is a member of the subcommittee, and I was going to ask him, as a member of both committees, when we would get a report on the bill.

Mr. McLAURIN. I think on next Friday.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is the only point I wanted the Senator's time on, because if many Senators understood that the bill is to be reported to the Senate as early as this week they would much prefer to wait and vote upon the bill independently, instead of attaching it to the rate measure, where logically it does not belong. But if there is not going to be a report upon this matter at a reasonably early date, that might change the consideration, and for that reason I asked the Senator how soon he expects his committee to report back the bill.

Mr. McLAURIN. Let me be understood that I can not tell exactly when the committee will make its report.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I wish only the Senator's opinion.

Mr. McLAURIN. I think it is reasonably certain that the committee will make a report by next Friday.

Mr. CULLOM. Will the Senator from Mississippi allow me to make one remark?

Mr. McLAURIN. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOM. I simply want to say as a member of the committee that I have no doubt the committee will report that bill at the next meeting, which will be next Friday.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That being true——

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. McLAURIN. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. I should like to ask the Senator from Mississippi if it is not true that it was understood that the final vote on the bill was to be taken at the last meeting, and the bill reported and the fact——

Mr. McLAURIN. That is right.

Mr. ALDRICH. And the fact that the Senate on Friday met at 11 prevented the attendance of members of the committee; but it was understood that last Friday the bill should be reported.

Mr. McLAURIN. We had a pretty full attendance last Friday—I believe it was last Friday.

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes; it was last Friday.

Mr. McLAURIN. Had it not been that the Senate met on that day at 11 o'clock I think the bill would have been reported.

Mr. ALDRICH. It met at the same hour the committee was called for, and I myself have no doubt whatever but that the bill will be reported at the next meeting of the committee.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I think it is unnecessary for me to say that I have favored the plan of the House bill upon this question. The public requires that railroad trains shall be run, run at a high rate of speed, run at night, and the men who operate those trains must depend upon the faithful performance of those whose duty it is to see that every instrumentality is in its place. But I doubt the wisdom of loading down the pending bill and imperiling perhaps its passage by an amendment of this character.

I have worked in season and out of season to get the other bill perfected, and had it not been that on last Friday the Senate met at 11 o'clock I have no doubt whatever but that we would have reported the bill out on that day, and I have no doubt but that we will report it out on next Friday. While I favor the bill which is before the committee I know but little of the terms of the pending amendment, and rather than to load down the pending bill and possibly jeopardize it, I shall feel constrained at this time to vote against the amendment, although heartily in spirit in favor of enacting at the present session of Congress a bill of substantially this character.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SPOONER (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK].

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 28, nays 45, as follows:

YEAS—28.

Bacon	Culberson	Kittredge	Newlands
Bailey	Daniel	La Follette	Overman
Berry	Dubois	Latimer	Rayner
Blackburn	Frazier	McCreary	Simmons
Burkett	Fulton	Mallory	Stone
Clarke, Ark.	Gamble	Martin	Taliaferro
Clay	Gearin	Morgan	Teller

NAYS—45.

Aldrich	Cullom	Kean	Pettus
Alger	Dick	Knox	Piles
Allee	Dillingham	Lodge	Platt
Allison	Dolliver	Long	Proctor
Ankeny	Dryden	McCumber	Scott
Brandegee	Elkins	McEnery	Smoot
Bulkeley	Flint	McLaurin	Sutherland
Burnham	Foraker	Millard	Warner
Carter	Frye	Nelson	Wetmore
Clapp	Gallinger	Nixon
Clark, Wyo.	Hansbrough	Penrose
Crane	Hopkins	Perkins

NOT VOTING—16.

Beveridge	Clark, Mont.	Hale	Patterson
Burrows	Depew	Hemenway	Spooner
Burton	Foster	Heyburn	Tillman
Carmack	Gorman	Money	Warren

So Mr. LA FOLLETTE's amendment was rejected.

Mr. DANIEL. I beg leave to propose an amendment, to come in on page 25 as section 8.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 7 add a new section, to be known as section 8, and to read as follows:

SEC. 8. Every common carrier by railroad engaged in trade or commerce in the District of Columbia, or in any Territory of the United States, or between the several States, or between any Territory and another, or between any Territory or Territories and any State or States or the District of Columbia, or with foreign nations, or between the District of Columbia and any State or States or foreign nations, shall be liable to any of its employees who are occupied in such trade or commerce, or, in the case of his death, to his heirs at law, for all damages which may result from the negligence or mismanagement of any of its officers, agents, or employees, or by reason of any defect or insufficiency in its cars, engines, appliances, machinery, track, roadbed, ways, or works.

In all actions hereafter brought against any such common carriers by railroad to recover damages for personal injuries to an employee, or where such injuries have resulted in his death, the fact that the employee may have been guilty of contributory negligence shall not bar a recovery where his contributory negligence was slight in comparison to that of the employer.

No contract of employment, insurance, relief benefit, or indemnity for injury or death entered into by or on behalf of any employee, nor the acceptance of any such insurance, relief benefit, or indemnity by the person entitled thereto, shall constitute any bar or defense to any action brought to recover damages for personal injuries to or death of such employee.

Nothing in this act shall be held to limit the duty of common carriers by railroad or impair the rights of their employees under the safety-appliance act of March 2, 1893, as amended April 1, 1896, and March 2, 1903.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I voted——

Mr. DANIEL. I thought I had the floor on this amendment.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Very well; I merely wanted a minute or two.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia had taken his seat, and the Senator from Indiana rose and received recognition. The Chair will recognize the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. DANIEL. I shall delay the Senator from Indiana but a few moments.

Mr. President, I shall impose but a few moments upon the Senate's long-strained patience. As it is aware, this amendment was offered by me about six weeks ago. There are no original ideas in it. It embodies the views which have been published and discussed for several years, and which have been several times discussed in both bodies of Congress. It is substantially based upon the House bill, which was in itself a transcript of or an embodiment of the main ideas concerning a reform and advancement in actions for damages by railroad employees injured while conducting interstate commerce.

The ideas of this amendment, Mr. President, embody a world-wide progress. It is based upon propositions which have found favor not only in the Old World, but in many of the States of this country. In my own State the equity and justice of providing a liberal method for the recovery of damages by railroad employees was so highly regarded that it was embodied in the new constitution of Virginia, and it would seem that the Virginia convention was so fortunate in its expression of ideas on this subject that its views were almost literally copied afterwards by the State of Oregon. The only substantial difference between the proposition as I have now offered it and the bill which has passed the House of Representatives, and is now under consideration by the Interstate Commerce Committee, is that I have left out the proviso, which is contained in section 3, which, as we have been told, is a subject of controversy in the committee. That proviso reads:

That upon the trial of such action against any such common carrier by railroad the defendant may set off therein any sum it has contributed toward any such insurance, relief benefit, or indemnity that may have been paid to the injured employee, or, in case of his death, to his heirs at law.

I have thought it best, Mr. President, not to involve in the general rule which we shall establish for the damages to be recovered by railway employees anything whatsoever concerning the collateral relations or contracts or engagements or understandings that those employees may have with respect to their employments and the reception of benefits from the corporation which may hire them. Considerations of that description are apt to be estimated in the gauge of wages which shall be given to the employees, and I would rather that it rest there and not involve it in the plain, direct, and positive remedy which the Federal courts and other courts administering Federal law would accord to them.

With respect to the law of negligence, there is a variation between this proposition and, as I understand it, the proposition which was submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], which has just been voted down. The only change in the common rule about negligence is that if the employee has been guilty of contributory negligence it shall not bar a recovery where his contributory negligence was slight and that of the employer was gross in comparison, and that the damages shall be diminished by the jury in proportion to the amount of negligence attributable to such employee. I believe that that is about as far as we should go in refining upon the general doctrine of negligence, and in going this far we tread in the steps which some of the States and some of the tribunals have already taken.

We have to thank the committee, Mr. President, for the report that it has made on this subject. In the hearings before the Committee on Interstate Commerce, in the fourth volume, I think it is—at least it is in one of the volumes which concern the liability of employers—there will be found much valuable and pertinent matter upon this subject. I will not weary the Senate in quoting cases, but I will ask to append to my remarks, for general information upon this subject, a brief synopsis which that committee has made, from page 56 to page 61, inclusive, of the laws of the States on this subject. It is apropos of this proposition and is very enlightening.

Mr. President, I have no doubt from what has been said that the committee is acting in entirely good faith on this subject, and that it is working along as fast as the weight of its numerous and great labors will permit; but now is an opportunity to pass this measure. We know not what will be its fate if we do not adopt this opportunity. It is germane to this bill, which is not a mere rate bill, but a bill to regulate interstate commerce. The laborer is worthy of his hire, and the laborer is worthy of the care of this Government, which he serves in interstate commerce, and of this whole people.

In my judgment, Mr. President, if you could put in the penitentiary and let the people see in stripes some of the big thieves of this country who are gathering riches without honest service and are plundering the possessions of widows and orphans for campaign funds and other illegitimate purposes, and extend your watchful care over all honest men who are risking their lives and giving their brain and brawn to honest and intelligent service, you would be justly applauded by all the good people of this country, and upbraided by none save those whose upbraidal is a compliment.

APPENDIX.

Kentucky.—The constitution of Kentucky makes employers liable for death due to the negligence of their employees. (Kentucky Constitution, sec. 241.)

In 1894 the legislature enacted this provision into statute.

Georgia.—Georgia entirely abolished the fellow-servant doctrine as to railroads by statute in 1856. (Georgia Code, 1895, secs. 2297, 2323.)

Iowa.—In 1862 the legislature of Iowa entirely abolished the doctrine as to railroad employees operating trains. (Iowa Code, 1897, sec. 2071.)

Kansas.—In 1874 Kansas entirely abolished it as applied to railroads. (Kansas General Statutes, 1889, par. 1251.)

Wisconsin.—In 1875 Wisconsin entirely abolished it. (Wisconsin Acts, 1875, ch. 173.)

This law was repealed by chapter 232 of the acts of 1880. In 1889 the legislature enacted a new law which was more limited. (Wisconsin Acts, 1889, ch. 438.)

In 1893 this law was repealed by chapter 220, which chapter entirely abolished the fellow-servant doctrine as to men actually engaged in switching or the running of trains. In 1903 this law was amended so as to make it broader in scope. (Wisconsin Laws, 1903, ch. 448.)

Minnesota.—In 1887 Minnesota entirely abolished the doctrine as regards railroad employees engaged in operating railroads. (Minnesota General Statutes, 1894, sec. 2701.)

Florida.—In 1887 Florida abolished the doctrine as regards railroad employment. In 1891 this law was amended somewhat, but as it now stands it practically abolishes the fellow-servant doctrine in cases where employees are injured through the running of locomotives, cars, or other machinery. (Florida Revised Statutes, 1892, p. 1008.)

Ohio.—In 1890 Ohio modified the doctrine by declaring that employees who have power to direct other employees are not fellow-servants of those employees in other departments who have not the power to direct or control in the branch or department in which they are employed. (Ohio Acts, 1890, p. 149, sec. 3.)

In 1902 another law was passed which makes all employers liable for injuries to employees which are caused by reason of any defect in the condition of the machinery connected with or used in the business of the employer when such defect was due to the negligence of any person in the service of the employer, intrusted by him with the duty of inspection, repair, or of seeing that the machinery or appliances were in proper condition. (Ohio Laws, 1902, p. 114.)

Mississippi.—In 1890 by an amendment to the constitution Mississippi greatly modified the doctrine as regards railroad employees by declaring that an employee could recover for an injury received through the negligence of a superior agent or officer, or of a person having the right to control or direct the services of the party injured, and also when the injury results from the negligence of a fellow-servant engaged in another department of labor from that of the party injured, or of a fellow-servant on another train of cars, or one engaged about a different piece of work. (Mississippi Constitution, sec. 193.)

In 1892 this provision of the constitution was adopted by the legislature as official. (Mississippi Code, 1892, sec. 3559.)

In 1896 the legislature extended the provisions of this section by making them apply against all classes of corporations.

Texas.—By act of 1891 and an amendment in 1893 Texas greatly modified the doctrine as to railroad employees by declaring that employees having the authority of superintendence, control, or command of other persons in the employment or with the authority to direct any other employee in the performance of the duty of such employee are not fellow-servants, and that employees engaged in different departments are not fellow-servants. (Texas Revised Statutes, 1895, secs. 4560 F, 4660 G, 4560 H.)

In 1897 these provisions were also made to apply to street railways. (Texas Acts, 1897, ch. 6.)

New Mexico.—In 1893 the Territory of New Mexico modified the doctrine as to railway corporations by making them liable for injuries received by employees, occurring or sustained in consequence of any mismanagement, carelessness, neglect, default, or wrongful act of any agent or any employee of such corporation, while in the exercise of their several duties, when such mismanagement, carelessness, neglect, default, or wrongful act of such employee or agent could have been avoided by such corporation through the exercise of reasonable care or diligence in the selection of competent employees, agents, or by not overworking said employees or requiring or allowing them to work an unusual or unreasonable number of hours. (New Mexico Compiled Laws, 1897, sec. 3216.)

Arkansas.—In 1893 Arkansas greatly modified the doctrine as to railroad employees by declaring that employees having the authority or superintendence, control, or command of other persons in the employment or with the authority to direct any other employee in the performance of the duty of such employee are not fellow-servants, and that employees engaged in different departments are not fellow-servants. (Arkansas Digest, 1894, secs. 6248–6250.)

South Carolina.—South Carolina, in its constitution as ratified in 1895, greatly modified the doctrine as applied to railroad labor by declaring that an employee may recover for injuries received through the negligence of another employee having the right to control or direct the services of a party injured, and also when the injury results from the negligence of a fellow-servant engaged in another department of labor from that of the party injured, or of a fellow-servant on another train of cars, or one engaged about a different piece of work.

This section of the constitution also gives the legislature the authority to extend its provisions to other classes of employees. (South Carolina Constitution, art. 9, sec. 15.)

In 1901 the legislature extended the same rights to employees of street railways. (South Carolina Laws, 1901, act 405.)

Missouri.—In 1897 Missouri greatly modified the doctrine as applied to railroads by declaring employees intrusted by such corporation with the authority of superintendence, control, or command of other persons in the employ or service of such corporation, or with the authority to direct any other servant in the performance of any duty of such servant, or with the duty of inspection or other duty owing by the master to the servant, are not fellow-servants with such employees, and by saying that employees in any department or service are not fellow-servants with employees in any other department or service of such corporation. (Missouri Acts, 1897, p. 96.)

North Carolina.—In 1897 North Carolina entirely abolished the doctrine as applied to railroads. (North Carolina Acts, 1897, vol. 2, ch. 56.)

North Dakota.—In 1899 North Dakota greatly modified the doctrine as applied to railroads by giving employees the right to recover when injured through the negligence of any other employee while engaged in switching or operating trains. (North Dakota Acts, 1899, ch. 129.)

Alabama.—In 1885 Alabama greatly modified the doctrine as applied to all classes of employment, not confining itself to railroads alone, by making employers liable for the negligence of:

(1) Persons intrusted by the employer with the duty of seeing that the way, works, machinery, or plant are in proper order.

(2) Persons who have any superintendence intrusted to them by their employer.
(3) Persons authorized to give the order or direction which occasioned the injury.
(4) Persons acting in obedience to rules, regulations, or by-laws, obedience to which caused the accident.
(5) Persons obeying particular instructions given by any person duly authorized in that behalf by the employer.
(6) Persons in charge of any signal, points, locomotives, engines, switches, cars, or trains upon a railway, or upon any part of a track of a railway. (Alabama Code, 1897, secs. 1749–1750.)

Massachusetts.—In 1887 Massachusetts greatly modified the doctrine as regards all classes of employment except domestic and farm laborers.

This law was amended in 1892, 1893, and 1894, and as it now stands makes the employer liable for the negligence for the following classes of servants:
(1) Persons intrusted by the employer with the duty of seeing that the ways, works, or machinery were in proper condition.
(2) Persons intrusted and exercising superintendence, whose sole and principal duty is that of superintendence.
(3) Persons acting as superintendent with the authority and consent of the employer.
(4) Persons in charge of any signal, switch, locomotive, engine, or train upon a railroad. (Massachusetts Acts, 1887, ch. 270; also 1893, ch. 359, and 1894, ch. 499.)

Indiana.—In 1893 Indiana greatly modified the doctrine as applied to employees of all corporations, except municipal, by declaring that such corporations are liable for the injuries received through the negligence of any person in the service of such corporation to whose order or direction the injured employee at the time of the injury was bound to conform and did conform; and where such injury resulted from the act or omission of any person done or made in obedience to any rule, regulation, or by-law of such corporation, or in obedience to the particular instructions given by any person delegated with the authority of the corporation in that behalf; also where such injury was caused by the negligence of any person in the service of the corporation who has charge of any signal, telegraph office, switch yard, shop, roundhouse, locomotive engine, or train upon a railway, or where such injury was caused by the negligence of any person, coemployee, or fellow-servant engaged in the same common service in any of the several departments of the service of any such corporation, the said person, coemployee, or fellow-servant at the time acting in the place and performing the duty of the corporation in that behalf, and the person so injured obeying or conforming to the order of some superior at the time of such injury having authority to direct. (Indiana Annotated Statutes, 1894, secs. 7083, 7085, 7087, 7089.)

Colorado.—In 1893 Colorado modified the doctrine somewhat, and in 1901 it completely abolished the doctrine as applied to all classes of labor.

Utah.—In 1896 Utah greatly modified the doctrine as regards all classes of employees by declaring that employees who are intrusted by their employers with the authority of superintendence, control, or command of other persons in the employ or service of such employer, or with the authority to direct any other employee in the performance of any duties of such employer are not fellow-servants, and that all other employees are not fellow-servants unless they are working together at the same time and place, to a common purpose, of the same grade of service, and neither of such persons are intrusted by such employer with any superintendence or control over his fellow-employees. (Utah Acts, 1896, ch. 24.)

Maryland.—In 1902 the legislature of Maryland passed a law which applies to coal and clay mines, quarries, steam and street railroads, and makes the employer liable to his employees for injuries caused through the negligence of his servants or employees, unless a certain plan of insurance, which is laid down by the statute, is adopted. (Maryland Acts, 1902, ch. 139.)

Virginia.—Section 12 of the Virginia constitution of 1902 abolished the doctrine with reference to a large class of railroad employees and permits the general assembly to enlarge this class of employees and to extend these rights to employees of any firm or corporation.

In 1902 the legislature enacted a law which greatly modified the doctrine as applied to railroad employees by making railroad corporations liable to their employees for injuries received when such injury results from the wrongful act, neglect, or default of an agent or officer of such corporation superior to the employee injured, or of a person employed by such corporation having the right to control or direct the services of such employee injured, or the services of the employee by whom he is injured; and also when such injury results from the wrongful act, neglect, or default of a coemployee engaged in another department of labor from that of the employee injured, or of a coemployee on another train of cars, or a coemployee who has charge of any switch, signal point, or locomotive engine, or who is charged with dispatching trains or transmitting telegraph or telephonic orders.

Oregon.—In 1903 the legislature of Oregon enacted a law practically word for word the Virginia statute just quoted.

Montana.—The legislature of Montana, which is now sitting, has just passed an act which completely abolishes the doctrine as applied to railroad employees.

Porto Rico.—The revised statutes of Porto Rico of 1902, section 322, provides that the employer shall be liable to the employee for injury by reason of the negligence of any person in the service of the employer who has charge of, physically controls, any signal, switch, locomotive engine, car, or train in motion, whether attached to an engine or not, upon a railroad.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I desire only to say that I shall vote against this amendment, as I did against the preceding amendment, only because of the public assurance given by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. McLAURIN], who is a member of the Interstate Commerce Committee, that the bill on this subject, now being considered by the committee, will be reported out this week; also the public assurance which I understood the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], the chairman of the committee, gave that the bill would be reported out this week; also the assurance which the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] gave, and also the assurance of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN], who is the chairman of the subcommittee having the bill in charge. With the assurance of all these Senators, publicly made and also privately made, Mr. President, I myself can not get my consent, and I know that several other Senators can not get their consent, to vote for this bill as an amendment to the pending rate bill. It has no logical connection with rate making.

While I favor, and there are other Senators on this side who quite as earnestly and sincerely favor, some legislation of this kind which will be effective, as does any Senator on the other side of this Chamber, yet it does not appear to be necessary to vote for such an illogical proposition as that as an amendment to the rate bill, when, I repeat, we have the assurance, publicly and privately given, not by one, but by several members of the committee having this bill in charge, that that bill will be reported to the Senate during the present week, and that, having been reported, it will be called up for consideration.

There being, therefore, Mr. President, assurance that the Senate will have an opportunity to vote upon this precise amendment in the form in which the Senate should act upon it—namely, as a separate proposition—I have not found it proper or right to vote for either of these amendments to the rate bill, with which logically they have no connection.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I offer the amendment to the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the proposed amendment of Mr. DANIEL it is proposed to add the following:

Provided, however, That upon the trial of such action against any such common carrier by railroad the defendant may set off therein any sum it has contributed toward any such insurance, relief benefit, or indemnity that may have been paid to the injured employee, or, in case of his death, to his heirs at law.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I offer that amendment because I think it ought to accompany the amendment which the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] has submitted; but I shall vote against the amendment submitted by the Senator from Virginia. If we are to modify the old and well-established doctrine of contributory negligence in favor of the employee—and I am not expressing any opinion as to the wisdom of that—in my judgment we ought at least to protect the corporation to the extent that the corporation has contributed to the relief of the injured employee in the line indicated by the amendment I have offered to the amendment.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I want to call attention to the fact that the bill which is pending in the Interstate Commerce Committee, the bill which has passed the House, is not identical with that which has just now been offered as an amendment by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL]. The bill as it is pending before the Interstate Commerce Committee does contain the provision—and I think very properly so—that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] has just offered.

Mr. DANIEL. The Senator may not have heard me, but I so stated myself.

Mr. FORAKER. Namely, that if the carrier has paid the benefit, in case of the liability being established in the court, it shall have a credit to the amount of such payment. I understand that kind of provision is entirely satisfactory to those who are urging the legislation in question.

The bill as it passed the House and is now pending before the Interstate Commerce Committee is not identical with the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia in other respects, but, inasmuch as the bill is shortly to be reported from the committee, I presume it is unnecessary to discuss the measure here. I felt, in view of the care some Senators were taking to state that assurance had been given, upon which they were relying, that they will have a chance to vote on this proposition at another time, I would call attention to the fact that it is not precisely the same proposition nor is it likely to be the same proposition.

I want to say, inasmuch as I have said this much, that I heartily favor legislation of this general character; but there is a very serious question raised by this proposed legislation as it passed the House with respect to these benefit societies. It is agreed, as I understand, by everybody that they have been of the greatest good, and that employees have been much helped by them, and there is a very serious question as to whether we are not destroying their efficiency by this kind of legislation. I do not know whether I will agree with that proposition. We had only reached the consideration of it when our committee was compelled to rise at its last meeting to attend the session of the Senate. It is in order that we may consider that proposition that we are to have another meeting this week. What the action of the committee will be I do not know. I may favor it or I may not favor it. I have not had any time to examine the arguments that have been made pro and con with respect to it, and I do not want anybody to give any assurance, so far as I am concerned, as to the form in which this measure will be reported from that committee.

I do not entirely agree with some of my colleagues on the committee—a majority of them, perhaps—as to the amendment which it has been stated has been adopted. I reserved the right, when the committee took that action and we were compelled to rise without making a report, to further consider it and to ask the committee to consider it again at its next meeting. I was not satisfied with it then; I am not satisfied with it now; but when we further consider it I may change my mind about it. I only want to reserve the right to do so. I may disappoint some people, but I will not mislead anybody.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, for many years the State of Iowa has had in its legislation provisions similar to these amendments, and I have felt ever since this question has been before the Senate that legislation involving these changes in the common-law liability of employers should be adopted. I have hesitated to vote to put the provisions upon this bill in view of the legislative situation.

The House of Representatives has discharged its duty according to its lights in respect to both these bills, and I am not sure what attitude the House would take toward the Senate if they should find their own bill left without consideration here, and similar propositions placed upon the rate bill and sent into conference. I am not sure that we would not impede rather than promote the enactment of the desired legislation.

I have not had the opportunity in the recent meetings of the Interstate Commerce Commission to participate in their deliberations, on account of the pressure of other committees of which I am a member which have been in session practically every day during the last week or ten days. Therefore, I have not been in a position to know exactly what the attitude of the Interstate Commerce Committee is; but I have received a general impression that within a few days the House bill will be presented to the Senate. It does not particularly matter in what form it is presented here; every question that is involved in the legislation will be brought to a test vote in the Senate when that bill is considered. If I thought there would be any delay in reporting or in considering that bill in the Senate, I would certainly be disposed to vote for this amendment.

My conviction is that the bill in a substantial form will be reported, and if any inward parts have been removed from it by the act of the committee, they can be restored on this floor, and undoubtedly will be. Therefore, considering in a general way the best method of expediting this legislation, I have reached the conclusion that it would be better on the whole not to attach these provisions to a bill where they do not strictly belong, but from which they may be detached under circumstances that we will not be entirely able to control.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] to the amendment of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL].

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. McLAURIN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk. I do not know exactly the proper place where it should be inserted, but I think it should be at the place where the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] would have come in.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add to section 7 the following:

In the trial of any case in a court of the United States to recover damages for personal injuries the court shall be governed, in determining liability or nonliability, by the laws of the State where such injuries were received.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. McLAURIN].

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the next section of the bill.

The Secretary read section 8 of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 8. That a new section be added to said act at the end thereof, to be numbered as section 24, as follows:

"SEC. 24. That the Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby enlarged so as to consist of seven members with terms of seven years, and each shall receive $10,000 compensation annually. The qualifications of the Commissioners and the manner of the payment of their salaries shall be as already provided by law. Such enlargement of the Commission shall be accomplished through appointment by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, of two additional Interstate Commerce Commissioners, one for a term expiring December 31, 1911, one for a term expiring December 31, 1912. The terms of the present Commissioners, or of any successor appointed to fill a vacancy caused by the death or resignation of any of the present Commissioners, shall expire as heretofore provided by law. Their successors and the successors of the additional Commissioners herein provided for shall be appointed for the full term of seven years, except that any person appointed to fill a vacancy shall be appointed only for the unexpired term of the Commissioner whom he shall succeed. Not more than four Commissioners shall be appointed from the same political party."

Mr. LODGE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk as a substitute for section 8. I have modified it somewhat from the printed form.

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator tell me on what page of the printed amendments his amendment can be found?

Mr. PROCTOR. On page 157 of the pamphlet amendments.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; on page 157.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts is a substitute for section 8 of the bill. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 25, line 6, after the words "Sec. 24," it is proposed to strike out the rest of the section and to insert:

On the passage of this act an Interstate Commerce Commission shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to take the place of the present Interstate Commerce Commission. Said Commission shall consist of nine members, one for and from each judicial circuit of the United States. Not more than five members of said Commission shall be of the same political party. At least three of said Commission shall be lawyers of good and regular standing at the bar. Three members of said Commission shall be appointed for three years, three shall be appointed for six years, and three for nine years, and all subsequent appointments made on the expiration of a term of service shall be for nine years. Any Commissioner may be removed by the President for inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office, and vacancies caused by death, removal, or resignation shall be filled by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, by appointments for the remainder of the unexpired terms. The members of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall receive $12,000 compensation annually, and the Chairman of the Commission, who shall be a lawyer, $12,500.

No person owning stock or bonds of any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act, or who is in any manner pecuniarily interested therein, shall enter upon the duties of such office or at any time hold the same. Said Commissioners shall not engage in any other business, vocation, or employment. No vacancy in the Commission shall impair the right of the remaining Commissioners to exercise all the powers of the Commission. All laws and parts of laws conferring powers and imposing duties upon or otherwise relating to the heretofore-existing Interstate Commerce Commission shall continue in full force and effect and be applicable to the Interstate Commerce Commission established by this act, except as herein otherwise provided.

All the proceedings pending before the heretofore-existing Interstate Commerce Commission at the time this act shall take effect shall, without break or interruption, be deemed to be pending before the Commission established by this section, and shall continue on to conclusion before the new Commission.

Mr. HALE. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 6 of the amendment, on page 1, after the words "United States," it is proposed to insert "who shall have been for two years immediately preceding his appointment an actual resident in such circuit."

Mr. LODGE. I have no objection to the amendment. I will modify my amendment so as to accept it.

Mr. DANIEL. I ask that the amendment to the amendment may again be stated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts modifies his amendment in accordance with the suggestion of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. I do not wish to yield the floor, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine is entitled to the floor. The Secretary will state the modification.

The SECRETARY. On page 1 of the printed amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, line 6, after the words "United States," insert "who shall have been for two years immediately preceding his appointment an actual resident in such circuit;" so that if amended it will read:

Said Commission shall consist of nine members, one for and from each judicial circuit of the United States, who shall have been for two years immediately preceding his appointment an actual resident in such circuit.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands the Senator from Massachusetts to accept the modification.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I wish to say a word. I look upon section 8 as one of the most important in the bill. In fact, I think when we reach it we are approaching what I should call the constructive part of the measure. The attention of the Senate has been largely directed to the other end—all these proceedings, and to the final tribunal that shall settle the decisions made by the initiating commission. We are substantially out of the woods with regards to that part of the measure—the final tribunal. But to me that is not so important as the Commission that is to initiate and consider all of the great matters raised by this bill—the Interstate Commerce Commission.

I want that Commission to be dignified by our action, to be made strong, to be one that will command the respect of the public, of the corporations, of the carriers, and of the courts. I agree fully with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] that it should be made up of a member at least from each judicial circuit; that the salary should be so large that it will command the very best talent, and that when the Commission is organized it will set to work in a way to command the respect of everybody connected with the matter.

I do not mean to censure the present Commission; it has done the best it could; but it is not up to the magnitude of the task devolved upon the Commission. I would have every man selected from each circuit to be of the very first class; if a lawyer, the very best; if a business man, the very best; and would pay him accordingly, $10,000 or $12,000, if necessary. The consideration is a bagatelle compared with the result; and when you get a Commission of that kind, you have solved almost every question that will arise.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. HALE. I hope the Senator will not interrupt me, because I have only a little time.

I could, without much imagination, picture a Commission of the kind that I am feebly trying to describe and trying to secure here—so strong, so complete in its power and in its action, that first the carriers, the railroads, would think twice before they attempted to disturb its action. Moreover, the courts would hesitate before interfering with the action of a great tribunal such as we ought not to adjourn without establishing.

I have been almost heretical upon some matters connected with this subject. I do not want, Mr. President, to see the court the absolute rate-fixing power. I do not think that is good legislation. I want a tribunal, the Interstate Commerce Commission, that is so great, and will be so conservative and yet so complete in its action, that it will be the rate-fixing power. I want a tribunal that will be acknowledged by everybody—the roads, the lawyers, the courts, the people—as competent to deal with these great subjects, and so competent that no one will lay rude hands upon its findings, unless under the greatest press of conditions and where it is impossible that there shall not be an appeal taken.

Now, to do that certain things are requisite. The Senator from Massachusetts has covered them in the thought he must have had which inspires his amendment. You can not get a great commission without paying them to correspond with the dignity and the work and the service. Twelve thousand dollars is very large in our scale, but, as I have said, and I do not wish to repeat, it is nothing commensurate with the importance of getting the best man. I would have him a resident, and my amendment provides that he shall have been for two years an actual resident of the circuit from which he is appointed. I want no importations of favorites, or whoever they may be, into one of these judicial circuits. I want the member of the circuit to be to the manner born and carrying the confidence of the circuit which he represents. I want no more such performances as this country witnessed immediately after reconstruction, when there were forced upon the South a pack of northern judges who never commanded confidence, but were the reproach of the era in which they lived, and who gradually disappeared, to be succeeded by natives, by residents, by citizens of the States or circuits or districts for which they were appointed. Hardly one of those appointments has survived. In rare cases the merit, the integrity, the ability of the incumbent may have carried him through to the present day. There may be one or two such instances, but in such instances they lacked the moral force that comes from being residents and citizens of the district or circuit for which they were appointed.

I think if I should go on and take more time I would only repeat. I hope we shall not leave this great subject until we have dealt with it in the right way and have provided this tribunal, which will be found to be all that it ought to be—the solvent in nine cases out of ten that arise.

Mr. BACON. As the Senator from Maine indicates that he does not desire to proceed further, I wish to ask him a question.

Mr. HALE. As I am substantially through, if the Senator from Georgia desires to ask me a question I will not take my seat.

Mr. BACON. I desire to ask the Senator upon what idea the author of this amendment, who seems to be in accord with the Senator from Maine, distributes these appointees by circuits? What is the rule in the Senator's mind which would indicate that that is a proper distribution? The Senator will bear in mind that there have been very great changes since the circuits were originally organized.

Mr. HALE. If we had time and could divide the country into nine circuits and determine what States should be included in each circuit, I have no doubt we could get a juster distribution by circuits than at present. But the apparent method was to accept the circuits as they are laid out. I appreciate the disparity of the circuits as to extent, as to territory, as to population.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. HALE. With pleasure.

Mr. BAILEY. Could not that be obviated by providing that they should be appointed from transportation districts? I did have an amendment here dividing the country into nine transportation districts, including in each the States by name. I divided them as nearly as possible on the basis of population and railroad mileage, and it seemed to me to make a very just and fair arrangement. Now, if we should strike out the expression "judicial circuits of the United States" and insert "transportation districts" and send the bill to conference in that shape, the conferees would be compelled to complete it by providing that "the United States, for the purposes of this act, is hereby divided into nine transportation districts, to be composed as follows:" First, the following States, and second, third, fourth, and on, and then provide the machinery for the appointment, and otherwise, just as it is in this. I believe an amendment of that kind would be free from the objection that lies against identifying the transportation districts with the present judicial circuits.

Mr. HALE. I agree with the Senator; it would be a better way. I can not speak for the Senator from Massachusetts, who has offered the original amendment, but we are trying to get good legislation, fair legislation. I had not thought of the plan that the Senator from Texas suggests, about dividing the country into transportation districts. It seems to me there is great force in it. But we ought to do that here and provide what they shall be, how the appointments shall be made, and the qualifications, and then leave with the conferees its adjustment to the bill. This is so important that I do not think——

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. SCOTT. Does not the Senator from Maine think that in providing for these Commissioners it would be well to provide that one or more of them should be men thoroughly familiar with traffic and railroad operation, so that we might have practical men on the Commission?

Mr. HALE. I think the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts is so embracing that it covers it. That is a matter of detail.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair must inform the Senator from Maine that his time has expired.

Mr. HALE. I am very glad of it.

Mr. ELKINS. I have an amendment to offer to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from West Virginia proposes an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BAILEY. I thought there was an amendment to the amendment pending.

Mr. BLACKBURN. It was accepted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts accepted the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine.

Mr. BAILEY. If I had known that I would have offered the amendment I suggested.

Mr. ELKINS. I move to insert in line 10, page 2, after the word "dollars," the words:

> And the salary of the secretary of the Commission shall be $6,000 per annum; that of the assistant secretary, $4,000, and that of the chief clerk, $3,000.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia to the amendment.

Mr. FORAKER. Before the amendment is voted on I wish to make some remarks applicable to this general proposition. I do not want to oppose specifically the amendment the Senator from West Virginia has offered, but I do want to oppose the proposition to increase the number of Interstate Commerce Commissioners. I call attention, in the first place, to Appendix M of the hearings before the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate, and I ask that it may be embodied in the RECORD, without reading, as a part of my remarks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Appendix M is as follows:

APPENDIX M.—Hearings before the Committee on Interstate Commerce, United States Senate, in special session, pursuant to Senate resolution No. 288, Fifty-eighth Congress, third session.

TABLE FURNISHED BY THE INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION IN RESPONSE TO A LETTER OF SENATOR ELKINS, DATED JUNE 8, 1905, SHOWING THE FOLLOWING FACTS RELATIVE TO FORMAL COMPLAINTS BEFORE THE COMMISSION: (1) TITLE OF CASE, (2) DATE FILED, (3) DATE SUBMITTED, (4) DATE DECIDED, (5) COMPLIANCE OR NONCOMPLIANCE BY CARRIERS, AND (6) DATE SUIT WAS INSTITUTED IN CIRCUIT COURTS.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION,
Washington, November 21, 1905.

Hon. S. B. ELKINS,
Chairman Committee on Interstate Commerce,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

SIR: Complying with the request as set forth in your letter of June 8 for a statement showing, with reference to cases decided by the Commission—

1. Date of the application for relief.
2. Date of the argument after evidence has been taken.
3. Date of the decision of the Commission.
4. Whether the decision was obeyed by the carrier.
5. If not obeyed, whether a proceeding was instituted to enforce the decision; and if so, the date when such proceeding was instituted—the Commission has had the information compiled in the form of a table, which is inclosed. The table shows the date when each complaint was filed; the date when each case was finally submitted upon hearing of testimony simply or upon argument or briefs; the date of the decision of the Commission; whether the decision was obeyed; and if not, when any proceeding to enforce the order was commenced in the circuit court.

Very respectfully,

MARTIN A. KNAPP,
Chairman.

Mr. FORAKER. This appendix shows, and I want the attention of Senators to this, that since the Interstate Commerce Commission was organized, in the eighteen years of its existence, counting from the beginning down to November, 1905, it disposed of 386 cases that were brought before it. Only 183 of these cases were disposed of in less than one year from the time when the complaints were respectively filed. The remaining 203 required the following time for their disposition. Now, I want to call attention to this, for I know it is something Senators are not aware of, and the explanation for it is as plain and simple as anything can be. Of the 203 cases they have disposed of last referred to, one of them required over nine years from the filing of the complaint; one of them more than seven years, two of them more than five years, six from four to five years, thirty-three from three to four years, sixty-one more than two years but less than three years, ninety-nine of them more than one year. Most of them almost two years.

Mr. President, the trouble has been the trouble that will attend the doing of this kind of work by any board or any commission. Five men sitting in judgment in these complicated and difficult cases, hearing witnesses, hearing arguments, traveling over the country, going here and there to get evidence, will necessarily take much more time than is ordinarily taken in a court of record. I think the members of the Interstate Commerce Commission have been splendid men as a rule. I think they have been able men. I think they have been faithful men. I think they have striven to do their duty, and that they have done their duty as efficiently as any such board could. But it is a weakness attending any such board that it requires time for it to hear litigated propositions, to weigh evidence, to reach conclusions, and to announce opinions, and it is no wonder to me that they have taken on an average years to dispose of business that has been brought before them, in ninety-nine cases more than a year, in no case less than a year where there has been controversy, and extending all the way in longer and longer periods from two years up to nine years to dispose of these cases.

Now, if you increase the number to nine commissioners, you will increase that very difficulty. I think a board of five commissioners would be more efficient than a board of nine commissioners. I do not know what you would do with nine commissioners. They would be in each other's way. You will increase the difficulty, in my judgment, without any compensating benefit. It is no more to me than it is to anybody else whether we have five commissioners or seven commissioners or nine commissioners. Five commissioners is a very proper number. I think it would be more efficient if there were only three. But we have had five. We are accustomed to that number. If you make it seven you will intesify this difficulty. If you make it nine you will accentuate it still more.

Now, Mr. President, another word about it. We are to have, according to the amendment that has been offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, not more than five of the nine from the same political party. If there is anything in connection with this whole legislation that I have less patience with than another it is this proposition that you are to take into consideration political affiliations in securing a body of nine men to administer the great and responsible business interests which we are about to intrust to their care.

What have five Democrats or five Republicans, as such, to do with the business of this country? I do not think we should trammel the President in that way in making these appointments. I think we should leave it to his own good judgment. Then we are to have not only not more than five men from the same party, but we are to have not more than three lawyers on this board. If there is a class in this country who have less capacity to make railroad rates and establish railroad regulations, they are the lawyers of the country. We want business experience, not legal ability.

Mr. LODGE. It says "at least three lawyers."

Mr. FORAKER. At least three of said commissioners shall be lawyers. That is worse than I thought it was. I thought the requirement was that not more than three of them should be lawyers. I do not think any of them should necessarily be lawyers. I think that matter should be left to the President to determine. I think it is of a great deal more importance to the business interests of this country that the President should find somebody who knows something about the railroad business to go on this Commission than somebody who knows only about the litigation of the railroads and the lawsuits of the business interests of the country.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the Senator is a very great lawyer——

Mr. FORAKER. I hope the Senator will not take my time with compliments. If he has a question to ask let him ask it. I have only ten minutes more.

Mr. HALE. Does not the Senator think that in that great bureau there ought to be at least three lawyers?

Mr. FORAKER. Probably there should be two or three lawyers on it, but I would leave it to the President to say how many lawyers he would put on it. I would let the President take the whole United States of America into consideration—lawyers, merchants, carriers, traffic men, and everybody else—and select the number to constitute the Commission as we say it shall be composed, whether the number be five or seven or nine.

I have another proposition. If we are going to indulge in the "square deal," let us look at the map for a minute. I do not know who prepared it, but if these Commissioners are to be distributed according to judicial circuits——

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him for just a moment? I brought that map into the Senate. It was furnished me by the secretary of the Interstate Commerce Commission at my request.

Mr. FORAKER. I did not know where it came from, but it presents just what I wanted to call attention to.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Here is a statement of mileage in each of the circuits and the population.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator will allow me, I will beg the Senator to present it.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I hand it to the Senator to use.

Mr. FORAKER. I thank the Senator, though I did not want to take anybody else's ammunition. I would be glad if he would use it.

Mr. President, I want Senators to look at these judicial circuits. One, two, three, and four are practically in New England.

Several SENATORS. Oh, no.

Mr. FORAKER. Well, I may be stretching that a little. You see they are practically in New England. New England and New York constitute three, I think.

Mr. KEAN. With New Jersey and Pennsylvania.

Mr. FORAKER. Here are three. Then Ohio, Michigan, and Kentucky.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. FORAKER. I will send this to the desk and have it read. The Senator will excuse me for just a minute. There are three in what is called "New England." I expanded a little in New England.

Mr. HALE. Why not say Massachusetts?

Mr. FORAKER. We will include Pennsylvania and New York in it, but there they are all in the Atlantic seaboard States, practically all.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. FORAKER. In a moment. Then come the sixth and seventh circuits—seven, six, three, two. If one comes from each of those districts, they would have control of the Commission. The whole South would have only two. The central circuit, No. 8, the largest circuit, both in point of area and in railroad mileage, covering the whole central part of the country, and the circuit having the greatest possibility of future development in both wealth and population for the future, would have only one.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. FORAKER. I yielded to the Senator from Illinois; but I will yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. I wanted to suggest to the Senator from Ohio that he and I have had some little debate on this subject once before in the Senate, and realizing that this is a very important matter, and would necessarily be a prolific source of debate, I asked the Secretary of the Interstate Commerce Commission to prepare a similar map with the one I see the Senator has, and in order that Senators may have these maps as well as the figures accompanying them, giving the judicial circuits, the railway mileage in each, the population in each, the area in each, the form of complaints in the past five years——

Mr. FORAKER. The minutes are getting away.

Mr. TILLMAN. I was going to ask the Senator to let us adjourn this issue over and have the information printed to-night, so that every Senator in the morning can have all this data, because the Senator from Ohio can not make his point about New England having so much of this good thing unless other Senators realize——

Mr. FORAKER. I will agree to that if it is understood that I can have my other ten minutes in the morning. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOPKINS. Now, Mr. President, before the Senator from Ohio takes his seat——

Mr. TILLMAN. I should like to make a motion to have this document and the accompanying map printed to-night.

Mr. FORAKER. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will send it to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from South Carolina? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HOPKINS. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Ohio, before he takes his seat——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. To the fact that the judicial circuit where the Senator from Maine contends they should have a single member, the first circuit, is composed of the States of Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, and Rhode Island, and in that circuit they have but 5,629 miles of railroad, whereas in the eighth circuit they have 66,029 miles. So that Maine and Massachusetts and that New England circuit having 5,000 miles of railroad, would get one of these commissioners as against a district that has 66,000 miles of railroad in it.

Mr. HALE. We do not insist on that. We are ready to accept the suggestion of the Senator from Texas and have transportation districts within the Union divided equally.

Mr. CULLOM. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me?

Mr. FORAKER. If I have time enough left I will ask to have incorporated in the RECORD this analysis, which I was reading, made by Mr. Walker D. Hines, of Louisville.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The Interstate Commerce Commission has furnished the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce, under date of November 21, 1905, a statement showing the following facts relative to formal complaints before the Commission: (1) Title of case; (2) date filed; (3) date submitted; (4) date decided; (5) compliance or noncompliance by carriers; (6) date suit, if any, was instituted in circuit court. This has been published as Appendix M of the committee's hearings on "regulation of railway rates."

This statement covers a period of eighteen years and seven months and shows that during that time the Commission decided 386 formal complaints, or, on an average, a little less than 21 complaints per year.

Although it might naturally be assumed that the Commission, having to decide only twenty-one cases per year, could decide all of them promptly, yet we find from this statement that promptness has been by no means the rule.

Of the 386 cases included in the statement, only 183 were disposed of in less than one year from the respective dates the complaints were filed. The remaining 203 required much more time for their disposition, as follows:

Required over 9 years from filing of complaint	1
Required over 7 years from filing of complaint	1
Required over 5 years each from filing of complaint	2
Required from 4 to 5 years each from filing of complaint	6
Required from 3 to 4 years each from filing of complaint	33
Required from 2 to 3 years each from filing of complaint	61
Required from 1 to 2 years each from filing of complaint	99
Total	203

Of the 386 cases decided by the Commission, 72 were filed during the calendar year 1887, and it is noteworthy that 63 of these were decided in less than one year from the date of filing. On the other hand, of the 314 cases filed after the year 1887 only 120 were decided in less than one year from the date of filing the complaint. In other words, at the outset and before the Commission became overwhelmed with business it decided over 87 per cent of its cases within less than twelve months, but during the period from the second year of the Commission's existence to the present time it has decided only 38 per cent of its cases within twelve months from the time of filing.

The statement gives information only as to cases decided up to November 21, 1905, and not as to cases pending and not decided on that date. The Commission's annual reports show the number of formal complaints filed each year, and the statement now furnished shows which of those complaints have been decided. The following comparison shows the proportion of the complaints filed during each of the past three years which had been decided by the Commission up to November 21, 1905:

Year ending December 1—	Formal complaints filed.	Number of such complaints decided up to Nov. 1, 1905.
1903	81	28
1904	62	12
1905	65	2

Doubtless numerous formal complaints instituted in the years mentioned have been discontinued by the complainants, but the figures above given suggest that it is entirely probable that numerous cases one, two, or three years old, and perhaps older, are still before the Commission and undisposed of.

Therefore Appendix M does not give an entirely accurate idea as to delay on the part of the Commission in deciding cases under normal conditions, because it includes the large number of cases which were promptly decided at the outset before the Commission's office became congested with business and excludes such delayed cases as may have been pending before the Commission undecided on November 21, 1905. But, taking Appendix M as it stands, it is apparent that there have been serious delays on the part of the Commission.

Moreover, much of the delay in deciding these cases has occurred after all the evidence and arguments were in and the cases were submitted for decision. Appendix M discloses the following figures relative to the time required after submission for decision of the 203 cases which were not decided in less than a year after the filing of complaint:

Required over 4 years after submission	1
Required from 3 to 4 years each after submission	4
Required from 2 to 3 years each after submission	23
Required from 1 to 2 years each after submission	59
Required from 6 to 12 months each after submission	51
Were decided in less than 6 months	63
Cases date of submission not shown	2
Total	203

It will of course be understood that all of the 386 formal complaints disposed of by the Commission since its organization do not relate to rates. The information in that statement which is of especial interest at this time is that showing the length of time required to dispose of cases relating to rates wherein the Commission actually found occasion to condemn the rates of carriers.

On pages 840 and 841 of Volume II of the Hearings on the Regulation of Railway Rates before the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce is a table furnished by the Interstate Commerce Commission, showing cases in which the Commission found rates complained of to be unreasonable and ordered them to be discontinued. The last decision included in this table is one of July 27, 1904. The table contains sixty-three cases. Appendix M shows the time required for the decision of these cases to have been as follows:

Required over 4 years from filing of complaint	1
Required from 3 to 4 years each from filing of complaint	12
Required from 2 to 3 years each from filing of complaint	13
Required from 1 to 2 years each from filing of complaint	18
Required less than 1 year	19
Total	53

Thus twenty-six cases, or more than 41 per cent of the cases in which the Commission found it necessary to condemn rates, required more than two years for a decision, and the average time required for each of these twenty-six cases was slightly over three years.

II.

The delay disclosed by this analysis of Appendix M can be fully accounted for by a reference to the numerous grave and arduous duties imposed upon the Interstate Commerce Commission. If the Commission had had nothing to do, or but little to do, outside of the decision of formal controversies, it could have rendered its decision with far greater promptness.

The Commission is charged with the duty of receiving, filing, and supervising all the interstate tariffs of rates issued by railroads in this country; with the duty of receiving statistical reports from carriers subject to the interstate-commerce act, and of obtaining from them any further necessary statistical information, which must all be analyzed and formulated into general statistical reports under the Commission's direction; with the duty of receiving and compiling monthly reports from all interstate railroads relative to collisions, derailments, and accidents to passengers or employees. These functions are very important, and necessitate more or less personal supervision and direction by the members of the Commission.

The safey-appliance acts vest in the Commission certain important discretionary powers involving, for their proper exercise, much care and labor on the part of the members of the Commission. The safety-appliance acts also require the Commission to detect and prosecute all violations thereof, and for that purpose the Commission maintains a force of special agents or detectives, whom it must direct and supervise.

One of the most important and successful functions of the Commission has been that of acting as an intermediary between shippers and carriers, and in that capacity adjusting complaints and removing abuses—or, in other words, avoiding controversies and litigation. The proper discharge of this function demands a very large part of the attention of all the members of the Commission; it entails upon them a very heavy correspondence with shippers and carriers, and compels them to put their time largely at the disposal of shippers and officers of carriers seeking interviews. Considering the extent of this country, its enormous railroad mileage, and the thousands of controversies which may arise between shippers and carriers in which the mediation of the Commission would be valuable, these functions of themselves might well be calculated to take up practically the entire time of any single tribunal.

One of the most important functions of the Commission is to maintain a vigilant supervision of the carriers throughout the country for the purpose of detecting, prosecuting, and preventing the giving of secret rebates. The work necessary in the discharge of these functions has taken much of the Commission's time, and still it is generally accepted as true that the Commission has not devoted anything like enough time to this important subject.

In some of the larger States the State commissions seem to be kept busy looking after corresponding matters within their respective jurisdictions; yet the Interstate Commerce Commission, with a jurisdiction a hundredfold more extensive and dealing with a bewildering variety and complexity of local conditions, has been expected in the past to perform similar work throughout the United States and to find time for the prompt performance of all of it. The expectation has been unreasonable, and, naturally, it has not been realized in practice. The Commission has not had the time to attend to all of its duties, has been compelled to neglect very largely one of its most important and difficult duties, to wit, the detection and prevention of secret rebates, and the above analysis of Appendix M shows how much it has been delayed in discharging the important function of passing upon formal controversies between shippers and carriers.

As far back as 1890 the Commission took occasion to say, in its fourth annual report:

"When the question arises, as it often must, why obedience to the law is not more completely secured, it is in part answered by the very magnitude of the country and of its enormous railway mileage, equal to many times that of any other country and considerably exceeding that of all Europe combined.

"The railway mileage of this country, in round numbers, is about 160,000 miles. The number of railway employees exceeds 700,000, and adding to these the number connected with railroad transportation in various capacities, such as officials of roads, officers and employees of associations, traffic solicitors, legal advisers, and others, the aggregate is not far from a million, or nearly one-twelfth of the adult male population of the country. The business done includes the carriage of 540,000,000 tons of freight and 472,000,000 passengers. The enormous extent of the subject-matters of regulation is shown by these statements. Any criticism of the efficiency of regulation would obviously be defective if it failed to take note of the vast number of persons and the extent of the business to be regulated."

The statements thus made by the Commission were based upon the statistics for the year ending June 30, 1889. Comparing these figures with the statistics for the year ending June 30, 1904, which are the latest available, we find that the railway mileage has increased to over 214,000 miles, the number of railway employees to 1,296,000, the number of passengers carried to 715,000,000, and the number of tons of freight carried to 1,300,000,000.

Doubtless most of the dissatisfaction with the present interstate commerce act which has been engendered in various quarters has been based upon an apparent inefficiency of the law which would have disappeared entirely if the Commission had had the time to perform the duties imposed upon it. These considerations suggest the query whether a division rather than a multiplication of the Commission's present duties is not the thing needed for satisfactory enforcement of the law.

III.

The President in his last annual message to Congress laid emphasis upon "the need of providing for expeditious action by the Interstate Commerce Commission." Many of the pending bills seem to proceed upon the theory that the only thing needed in order to insure expeditious action by the Commission is to add to the Commission's duties and responsibilities.

For illustration, the Hepburn bill, without removing a single duty or function of the Commission, imposes upon it many other duties and functions. It provides that no advances or reductions shall be made in rates except after thirty days' public notice, unless the Commission, in its discretion and for good cause shown, allow changes upon less notice, either in particular instances or by general orders. It is well known that the legitimate necessities of commerce absolutely require many rates to be changed upon less than thirty days' notice, and that emergencies constantly arise which make it highly important that changes, and especially reductions, should be made on very short notice. The total number of imperative demands of this kind which will arise per month or per week will undoubtedly be very large where such an enormous and varied commerce and such a vast railroad mileage are involved. Whenever such a demand is presented to the Commission it will, under the Hepburn bill, become the duty of the Commission to take the necessary time to consider and act upon that demand; and every such demand will have to be given preference over all other matters, for a few days' delay will be equivalent to a denial. It is probable that this single provision will in itself be an immense embarrassment to the Commission in the discharge of its other functions.

The Hepburn bill also empowers and requires the Commission to establish through routes and joint rates, and where the carriers, parties thereto, can not agree, to prescribe the division of such rates and the terms and conditions under which such through routes shall be operated. This is an entirely new jurisdiction and transfers to the Commission the duty of making business arrangements among railroad companies where they can not agree among themselves. Whatever may be said of this plan on other accounts, it can not be denied that it will probably demand an important part of the Commission's time. The same observations apply with respect to the provision of the Hepburn bill authorizing the Commission to fix the reasonable compensation to be paid by a carrier to the owner of property for any service rendered or instrumentality furnished by such owner in connection with the transportation of his property.

Another important feature of the Hepburn bill is the authority given to the Commission to employ examiners for the purpose of inspecting all the accounts, records, and memoranda of carriers and to prescribe the form of all accounts, records, and memoranda which the carriers may keep. Such provision, duly safeguarded, is doubtless eminently proper for facilitating the discovery, punishment, and prevention of secret discriminations of every character; but it is obvious that the efficient performance of this function throughout the United States will require an immense amount of time and labor, not merely on the part of the examiners of the Commission, but on the part of the Commission itself. Such a grave and delicate duty can not properly be left to a lot of subordinates without constant supervision.

The Hepburn bill further imposes upon the Commission the paramount duty and responsibility of prescribing maximum rates for carriers throughout the United States whenever existing rates are complained of as unlawful. On every hand this is conceded to be a power of supreme delicacy and importance, requiring, for its discharge, undivided attention and ample time for complete investigation and deliberation.

Thus, in many directions, the Hepburn bill increases the duties, difficulties, and responsibilities of the Commission, and does not remove any obstacles which now stand in the way of the Commission's complete and prompt discharge of its duties. The plan to increase the membership of the Commission from five to seven will not afford relief. Primarily it simply means that a majority out of seven, instead of a majority out of five, must agree upon matters demanding action or decision upon the part of the Commission. Such increase in the membership of the Commission wholly fails to reach the inherent defect in the present system, which intrusts to a single tribunal so many different and difficult duties that it is utterly impossible to secure their prompt and adequate performance.

In these respects the Hepburn bill is typical of all the measures proposing to give the Commission the power to make or revise rates. All of them seem to lose sight of one of the principal objects of additional legislation, to wit, "the need of providing for expeditious action by the Interstate Commerce Commission." Appendix M shows how little expedition there has been on the part of the Commission in reaching a conclusion upon rate controversies before it. The present law, with its multifarious duties, explains why the results have not been expeditious. The Hepburn bill and similar measures propose to create more duties and difficulties, with the inevitable result that there would be even less expedition than has been realized under the present law. There would probably have to be even more neglect than in the past of the important function of stamping out rebates, and at the same time more delay in reaching conclusions upon rate controversies than Appendix M shows to have been habitual under the present law.

WALKER D. HINES.

LOUISVILLE, KY., February 8, 1906.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. FORAKER. I have only a minute.

Mr. CULLOM. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOM. I hold in my hand two different papers—one giving the States making the circuits, with the populations and the area, and also another which gives the mileage of the railroads. I ask to have these papers printed in the RECORD so that we may have a complete understanding of the whole situation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The judicial districts of the United States are divided into nine circuits, as follows:

First.—Rhode Island, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and Maine. Total area, 47,993; population, 4,339,956.

Second.—Vermont, Connecticut, and New York. Total area, 61,600; population, 8,520,955.

Third.—Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Delaware. Total area, 54,470; population, 8,370,519.

Fourth.—Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina, and South Carolina. Total area, 153,380; population, 7,235,154.

Fifth.—Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas. Total area, 518,810; population, 10,555,175.

Sixth.—Ohio, Michigan, Kentucky, and Tennessee. Total area, 179,940; population, 10,746,317.

Seventh.—Indiana, Illinois, and Wisconsin. Total area, 146,360; population, 9,407,054.

Eighth.—Nebraska, Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri, Colorado, North Dakota, South Dakota, Wyoming, Utah, Kansas, and Arkansas. Total area, 845,455; population, 12,567,967.

Ninth.—California, Oregon, Nevada, Washington, Montana, and Idaho. Total area, 656,952; population, 2,864,148.

Railroad mileage by judicial circuits, 1904.

First circuit.—Rhode Island, 209; Massachusetts, 2,110; New Hampshire, 1,191; Maine, 2,029. Total, 5,539.

Second circuit.—Vermont, 1,056; Connecticut, 1,020; New York, 8,167. Total, 10,243.

Third circuit.—Pennsylvania, 10,991; New Jersey, 2,266; Delaware, 334. Total, 13,591.

Fourth circuit.—Maryland, 1,340; Virginia, 3,284; West Virginia, 2,821; North Carolina, 3,914; South Carolina, 3,146. Total, 14,505.

Fifth circuit.—Georgia, 6,299; Florida, 3,586; Alabama, 4,591; Mississippi, 3,425; Louisiana, 3,593; Texas, 11,614. Total, 33,108.

Sixth circuit.—Ohio, 9,164; Michigan, 8,468; Kentucky, 3,262; Tennessee, 3,485. Total, 24,379.

Seventh circuit.—Indiana, 6,863; Illinois, 11,742; Wisconsin, 7,115. Total, 25,720.

Eighth circuit.—Nebraska, 5,778; Minnesota, 7,842; Iowa, 9,836; Missouri, 7,797; Kansas, 8,841; Arkansas, 3,947; Colorado, 4,990; North Dakota, 3,212; South Dakota, 3,169; Wyoming, 1,244; Utah, 1,640. Total, 58,296.

Ninth circuit.—California, 6,203; Oregon, 1,750; Nevada, 1,186; Idaho, 1,425; Washington, 3,232; Montana, 3,328. Total, 17,124.

It will be seen that the three New England, or eastern circuits, together have but an aggregate of 29,373 miles of railroad. These three circuits together have less mileage than the fifth circuit alone, and but about 5,000 miles more than the sixth circuit alone, and but 4,000 miles more than the seventh circuit alone; but a trifle more than one-half the mileage of the eighth circuit alone.

The total railroad mileage of the United States is 212,348, of which the three New England or eastern circuits have but 29,373 miles, or a little more than 13 per cent.

Mr. LODGE. I do not suppose that, from what the Senator from South Carolina has stated, there is any intention of concluding this amendment this evening.

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not see how we can.

Mr. LODGE. I think it would be much better if we should adjourn, but I should like, as I introduced the amendment and have said nothing about it so far, to say a single word.

I appreciated fully the disparity of the judicial circuits as a basis. What I desired to get at is a proper distribution of the membership of the Commission into different parts of the United States. I am ready to accept any proposition that will give that distribution. I think the suggestion of the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] is an excellent one, to make nine transportation districts. Therefore I do not think any great time need be wasted in showing how small New England is and how large the eighth circuit is. In those three circuits of New England, New York, and Pennsylvania, which are so small, there are 21,000,000 people, and I suppose that is the reason why there is some judicial business there.

But, Mr. President, that is not what I am seeking to attain. I want to get a commission that shall be worthy of the great business and responsibility we are going to impose upon them; the greatest responsibility that was ever imposed upon any administrative board in this country. We have not behind it all that the traditions and the history of the courts give to the courts. It is a creation of to-day for a specific work; and I want by length of tenure and by size of salary to give to it all the dignity and attraction it is possible.

I think also it is of the utmost importance that we should have a proper geographical distribution of the membership of the Commission. The Senator talks about the small circuits in the East, and at this moment, out of your five Commissioners, there are two out of one of those little circuits, the second. Fault is found that this is not a fair distribution, and at this moment you have two out of one of the smallest circuits. I want to see the membership properly distributed.

As to the political complexion, that is in the interstate law now, and was taken from it. I think it is a proper provision that the entire board should not at any time be given a political complexion, and that is precisely what we want to avoid.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. LODGE. No, Mr. President; I have but little time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts declines to yield.

Mr. LODGE. I desire, therefore, to get this proper distribution, and I think the suggestion of the Senator from Texas is exactly the one to follow. Let us agree to nine transportation districts, and they can be framed in conference, or framed here.

Mr. HALE. Here.

Mr. LODGE. They can be framed here to-morrow. I have no doubt that the Senator from Texas, who has given this matter thought, could bring in the nine districts arranged. We have been furnished by the Interstate Commerce Commission the comparative mileage in the different districts, and I do not think it would be a difficult thing to establish nine equal transportation districts, as nearly equal as possible in point of population and mileage.

As to having the Commission composed of nine members, it seems to me that that is very important. That is the number of the Supreme Court. I do not think, in view of the business and the responsibility that will fall on the Commission, it makes it at all too numerous.

Those are my reasons, Mr. President, for presenting this amendment. We need not waste any time about the judicial circuits. I am quite willing, I am desirous, to see them go. I am conscious of the disparity which exists among those circuits; but I do believe, and I believe it is the opinion of the majority of the Senate to-day, that we can not spend too much time and attention in making the Commission what it ought to be. That is where all the work under this law starts. We have given all our time to the courts, which are to have the review or the appeal, but these are the men who are to do the work. I hope that to-morrow the Senate will give sufficient time to make the Commission worthy of this great task.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, as the members of the Senate get salaries less than one-half what is proposed to be given to the members of the Commission, I think we have earned our salaries to-day, and I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. TILLMAN. Before that question is put, I move that the bill as amended up to the present time be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, May 15, 1906, at 12 o'clock meridian.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported the bill (H. R. 19264) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order.

NOTARIES PUBLIC IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 17133) to amend section 558 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 558 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, relating to notaries public, be amended by adding at the end of said section the following: "Provided, That the appointment of any person as such notary public, or the acceptance of his commission as such, or the performance of the duties thereunder, shall not disqualify or prevent such person from representing clients before any of the Departments of the United States Government in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, provided such person so appointed as a notary public who appears to practice or represent clients before any such Department is not otherwise engaged in Government employ, and shall be admitted by the heads of such Departments to practice therein in accordance with the rules and regulations prescribed for other persons or attorneys who are admitted to practice therein," so that said section shall read as follows:

"SEC. 588. NOTARIES.—The President shall also have power to appoint such number of notaries public, residents of said District, as, in his discretion, the business of the District may require: Provided, That the appointment of any person as such notary public, or the acceptance of his commission as such, or the performance of the duties thereunder, shall not disqualify or prevent such person from representing clients before any of the Departments of the United States Government in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, provided such person so appointed as a notary public who appears to practice or represent clients before any such Department is not otherwise engaged in Government employ, and shall be admitted by the heads of such Departments to practice therein in accordance with the rules and regulations prescribed for other persons or attorneys who are admitted to practice therein."

With the following amendments:

Page 2, line 3, strike out the comma after the word "therein" and insert a period.

Page 2, strike out, commencing with the word "so," in line 5, down to and including the word "therein," in line 20.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The question was taken; and the amendments were agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. BABCOCK. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I want to offer a second amendment to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Mississippi for the purpose of offering an amendment?

Mr. BABCOCK. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move to strike out the language in lines 11 and 12, on page 1, and the language in lines 1 and 2, on page 2, beginning with the word "provided," on line 11 of the first page, and ending with and including the word "employ," in line 2 of the second page; and I wish to give the reason for that, Mr. Speaker. This bill prevents clerks in the Government employ from acting as notaries public in the class of business with which the bill deals.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman is mistaken about his view of the effect on this bill. The bill does not intend to nor does it prevent anybody from acting as a notary public. It simply proposes to amend the law which prevents notaries public from practicing law or representing their clients in the Court of Claims or before any of the Departments. The gentleman's purpose is commendable. I drew the bill myself, and there is not anything in the bill to prevent anyone in the Government employ from acting as a notary public in attesting papers or administering oaths and such notarial acts. As the law stands, or as it has been construed by the Secretary of the Interior and other heads of Departments, the fact that a person is simply a notary public and holding no other office prevents him from representing anyone before the Departments or the Court of Claims. Now, this does not change the law with reference to permitting persons in employ of the Government from attesting papers, taking affidavits, and doing other notarial acts, but it does not permit anyone engaged in the Government service to practice law. The purpose of this bill, and its sole purpose, was to permit members of the bar who are notaries public to represent their clients in the Court of Claims, for instance. As the law now stands, the Supreme Court having decided that a notary public in the District of Columbia was an officer of the Government, by reason of the fact that they were notaries public they were not permitted to practice in the Court of Claims. This bill in no way interferes with the right of an employee of the Government from attesting papers and taking affidavits, and the gentleman's amendment, if it should prevail, would take out a very efficacious part of the existing law.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, with the explanation of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] that this bill does not interfere with the rights of employees of the Government in the Departments to act as notaries public in the Department, I shall withdraw the amendment which I have offered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws the amendment.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. BABCOCK. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] if the law now permits an attorney to swear his client to a bill filed in the District?

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, the law of Georgia does not. I do not think the law of any well-regulated government would.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, the courts have decided both ways. Does the law now permit a notary public in the employ of the Government to administer oaths to people who make claims against the Government?

Mr. BARTLETT. I suppose it could be done.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman does not know whether the law prohibits that or not.

Mr. BARTLETT. The law prohibits any person in the employ of the Government, a Member of Congress, or any other official of the Government from practicing before the Departments or the Court of Claims or any of the Departments and there representing their clients. This bill simply proposes to permit members of the bar in the District who are commercial notaries public for the purpose of attesting papers and taking affidavits to practice before the Departments and there represent their clients.

In other words, it grows out of the fact that the Secretary of the Interior and other heads of Departments have decided—and I think, maybe, properly—that a notary public in the District of Columbia was an officer of the Government, and the consequence has been notaries public in Maryland and Virginia who have their offices here as attorneys can practice, and these other gentlemen who reside in the District of Columbia do not and can not.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker—and I simply want to make this general observation, if the gentleman will indulge me for a moment, that I had occasion a number of years ago to be engaged in an attachment case. An issue arose in it based on this fact: An attorney had sworn his client to his client's bill—the attachment bill—and I found that the authorities throughout the States decided differently, some that such affidavit was not sufficient, etc., and that it was contrary to public policy to allow a lawyer to swear his client to his client's bill, and some held to the contrary. Now, I think it is equally reprehensible to allow a person in the employ of the Federal Government—I do not care whether he is in the Department or in Congress or anywhere else, except clerk of a court, perhaps—to swear people in making affidavits about claims against the Government.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I was about to say the regulations of the Departments prevent anybody appearing as attorney before the Departments from swearing their clients to the papers they present as proof.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That is all right, and that ought to be the LAW. It ought not to be simply a REGULATION. A regulation is a rule; it is not the law. That rule ought to be enacted into a statute. Then I think we ought to go a step further. We ought to stop people who are in the employ of the Federal Government from swearing people to affidavits and other proofs in claims against the Government. Members of Congress are not allowed to appear in claims against the Government, and I am glad of it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Neither are notaries public.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. A notary public in the employ of the Government should not be permitted to take affidavits in any matter that pertains to business with the Government.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Well, they do not.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It is a quasi-judicial act, and many courts have decided that. They have first to decide that the party is not insane or drunk, etc., and so on, from his personal observation, and the notary public should be entirely disinterested and impartial as an individual as well as an officer.

Mr. BABCOCK. I ask for a vote, Mr. Speaker.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; was read the third time, and passed.

REASSESSMENTS OF BENEFITS IN EXTENSION AND WIDENING OF SHERMAN AVENUE.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the same.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 18666) to provide for the reassessment of benefits in the matter of the extension and widening of Sherman avenue, in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the supreme court of the District of Columbia, holding a United States district court, is hereby authorized to finally ratify and confirm the verdict, award, and assessment of the jury found and returned in cause No. 555 in said court, in the matter of the extension and widening of Sherman avenue from Florida avenue to Whitney avenue, in the District of Columbia, as to all of those pieces or parcels of land with respect to which no objection has been filed to said confirmation, and to condemn the land necessary for the said widening and extension of said Sherman avenue; and in case any assessment for benefits against any piece or parcel of land mentioned in said verdict has been or may be vacated by reason of objections filed thereto, or for any other reason, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and directed to make application to said court for a reassessment of such benefits under and in accordance with the terms and provisions of the act of Congress approved June 6, 1900, entitled "An act for the extension of Columbia road east of Thirteenth street, and for other purposes;" and said assessments for benefits shall have priority over all deeds of trust, mortgages, judgments, and other liens.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time; was read the third time, and passed.

BILLS FROM COMMITTEE ON THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of bills on the Union Calendar reported from the District Committee.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 141, noes 31.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No quorum, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER (after counting). Two hundred and eleven Members are present—a quorum.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Tellers, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Those in favor of ordering tellers will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Thirty-one gentlemen have arisen; not a sufficient number.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The other side.

The SPEAKER. There is no other side in tellers.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to reserve points of order on all the bills in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. They are not appropriation bills, as the Chair understands.

Mr. MUDD. I understand some of them are. If it is not necessary I do not do so.

The SPEAKER. They are not general appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of bills on the Union Calendar reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia, Mr. LITTLEFIELD in the chair.

REGULATION OF SALARIES OF TEACHERS, SCHOOL OFFICERS, ETC.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 18442) to fix and regulate the salaries of teachers, school officers, and other employees of the board of education of the District of Columbia.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, pending that matter I have a little bill of importance that is necessary to get over to the other end of the Capitol, and therefore desire to call up before we take up the unfinished business. It is the bill (H. R. 9748) to provide for the further purification of the water supply of the District of Columbia.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK] asks for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 9748, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk proceeded to read.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Regular order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Clerk will omit the part stricken out of the bill.

Mr. SIMS. Is not this unfinished business?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK] asks unanimous consent that the amendment in the bill which he sent to the Clerk's desk may be read instead of the text of the bill.

Mr. SIMS. Is it a school bill or some other bill?

The CHAIRMAN. It is another bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. SIMS. I object, then.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Is not the order of business the unfinished business in the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would advise the gentleman from New York that the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WANGER], who moved to amend on line 1, page 6, by striking out "four" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "five," so that it will read "Librarian, board of education, class five," instead of "class four."

The question is on the amendment.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have some explanation of the effect of this amendment. An amendment was adopted at the last session changing the salaries of manual-training teachers, and increasing very substantially, I understood afterwards, their salaries. Now, I would like to know, and I think the committee would like to know, just what effect this amendment will have.

Mr. MORRELL. In answer to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], as far as the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WANGER] is concerned, it simply places the librarian of the board of education in class three instead of class four. In other words, the librarian will have a chance, after a certain length of service, of reaching a maximum salary of $1,100, instead of $900 as received at present.

Mr. PAYNE. How many of them are there?

Mr. MORRELL. One.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk proceeded to read the amendment.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, I would prefer if the gentleman would allow us to complete the paragraph before offering the amendment.

Mr. BURLESON. The paragraph has been read, and I am now trying to complete the paragraph.

Mr. MORRELL. I did not understand.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania suggests that the gentleman from Texas——

Mr. MORRELL. It was my idea that he withhold the amendment until we complete the other articles in the section.

The CHAIRMAN. This is the proper place for the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON].

Mr. BURLESON. I felt quite sure it was, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. We have not had the amendment yet. It has not been reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by substituting for lines 13, 14, and 15, on page 5, the following:

"Teachers of manual training, drawing, physical culture, music, domestic science, domestic art in the graded schools, classes 2 to 5; teachers of manual training, drawing, physical culture, music, domestic science, and domestic art in the high schools, classes 4 to 5."

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, when this bill was under consideration on a former day an amendment was offered and adopted which, I feel quite sure, this committee did not understand. The amendment was offered and adopted placing all teachers of manual training, drawing, physical culture, and music in the graded schools in Group A, class 6, which would entitle them at once to an unjustifiable increase in salary, some of them receiving an increase of $500, just double what is now being received. Under the bill as it was presented to the House by the Committee on the District of Columbia these teachers, embraced within the class I have mentioned, were amply provided for, and in the aggregate would receive an increase during the first year of $1,575. Under the amendment as it was offered and adopted, the aggregate increase in the salaries of these teachers would be $13,925.

Mr. SIMS. The minimum.

Mr. BURLESON. Now, I have no desire or purpose to minimize the importance of the work done by those who teach manual training, drawing, music, and calisthenic exercises, but I do say that of all the persons connected with the public school system this class is the least deserving, and yet under the operations of this amendment, which was adopted as I have stated, the salaries of fifty-five persons are increased, an increase out of all proportion to the increases which are allowed teachers from the first to the eighth grade in the public schools.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I feel quite sure that the members of this committee did not understand the scope and effect of this amendment at the time that it was offered; if you had, I feel sure it would not have been adopted. I will repeat, in order that you may understand my meaning. That paragraph, as amended, places certain teachers, of music, drawing, physical culture, etc., in group A, class 6, in the schedule; which gives to said teachers, in the aggregate, for the first year, an increase in salary amounting to $13,925, as against $1,575, which would have been allowed as this bill was reported from the committee, after it had given it most careful consideration, as the membership of the Committee on the District of Columbia have repeatedly assured us. Let us see what the effect of this would be for the second year. The aggregate increase for the second year, provided for on the unamended bill, would be $1,275; as amended, the increase would be $5,500; and this difference would continue, subject to modifications caused by changes in the teaching corps. The amendment affects fifty-five teachers, whose salaries range now from $500 to $1,000. Think of it! The number of the teachers of calisthenics, manual training, music, who are now receiving $500 and $575 and $600, are increased at once under this amendment to $1,000 as the minimum that they are to receive, and this increase is to continue from year to year at the rate of $100 per annum, until a teacher of music and a teacher of calisthenics and a teacher of drawing, under this amended bill, is to receive $1,800 a year. One person affected by this amendment is a carpenter now engaged as a teacher of manual training in teaching a class of fifteen small boys in one of the graded schools, at a salary of about $600. His salary will be increased at once $400 per annum.

Mr. Chairman, it is monstrously unjust and unfair to grant such an increase, especially to the least deserving of those connected with our public schools. I do not know and I will not say what the purpose of the amendment was, but surely it did not receive that careful consideration and that conscientious consideration that should be given to every amendment offered upon this floor intended to effect a material change in this important measure.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. BURLESON. Certainly; with pleasure.

Mr. PAYNE. There was no debate whatever on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] has expired.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks for one minute more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURLESON. The gentleman from New York is correct; no debate was had upon the amendment. No explanation whatever was offered to this House, indicating the scope of same. All I now desire to do is to bring the attention of the gentlemen of this committee to the condition that will be brought about if this amendment as adopted is permitted to stand, and let each man by his vote on the substitute I have offered, which will tend to correct, say whether he is willing to ratify and approve what was accomplished thereby.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to ask the gentleman before he leaves the floor why we raised these salaries at all?

Mr. BURLESON. Because the teachers in the public schools are not receiving proper compensation for their services at this time. I want the teachers of manual training, and I want the teachers of music, the teachers of drawing and physical culture all to receive a fair increase in their salaries, and I believe this bill as it was originally reported by the District Committee gave them a just and proper increase. But I do say that if the effect of this amendment is ratified by voting down the amendment I have offered, that it will be an unjust and a disproportionate increase of their salaries when compared with the salaries of other teachers engaged in the public schools.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. The gentleman from Texas was not speaking in my time, but I want to say, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, that he was speaking my sentiments. It is a very dangerous thing for a Member to rise in his place and offer an amendment and have it put upon its passage changing impromptu without consideration of the committee, without careful consideration of the House, the grade of salaries for a whole class. Again, it is unjust, as has been stated, to a class of teachers, however worthy they are, to see inferior in rank and importance to other classes and other grades put over and above the more important, as this amendment does. Again, it works a great hardship and injustice to those who are entitled to more rather than less on account of this amendment. I hope the motion will prevail that we agree to reconsider and go back to and adopt the report offered by the committee, which we have the right to assume was carefully considered and represents the best judgment of the united committee, rather than the motion made and adopted on the floor of the House with little or no discussion.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the gentleman from Texas why these salaries are raised at all?

Mr. BURLESON. Well, Mr. Chairman, I am not possessed of the power of mind reading; I am not a clairvoyant. I do not know why a gentleman on the floor offered an amendment.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I thought it was an amendment from the gentleman's committee.

Mr. BURLESON. The committee had made a just and proper provision for the salaries of these particular persons connected with the public schools, in my opinion.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Do the authorities here have any trouble in getting all the teachers they want at the salaries they are now giving teachers?

Mr. BURLESON. Do you mean generally?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. BURLESON. As a matter of fact, the District of Columbia has lost a number of the best teachers connected with the public school system in the last two or three years.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why?

Mr. BURLESON. That is the reason I am in favor of making a fair increase in the salaries. I am in favor of a fair increase in the salaries, but I am opposed to this disproportionate increase for those who teach sewing and calisthenics.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I have had some personal experience as to salaries to teachers in the country schools, but I do want to know why this horizontal increase in the salaries is given.

Mr. SIMS. Read the report of the committee and you will get a hundred pages of reasons.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I did not know that, and I was asking the gentleman from Texas, and the gentleman from Tennessee could perhaps give us some information on the subject, but has not. Mr. Chairman, I have the RIGHT TO KNOW, and I want to know, WHY we are raising the salaries of the schoolteachers, or anybody else, in the District of Columbia. I am never going to vote in the dark if I can help it. I might add I would like to know why we sit here, like a lot of cowards, and raise everybody else's salary and do not raise the salaries of Members of Congress—our successors, of course.

Mr. SIMS. Because we want to come back here.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. We raise every salary, it looks like, except Members of Congress. Yet we all know, and so do the people who have thought about it, that should be done—for our successors.

Mr. SIMS. Why do you not introduce a bill?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Because I have not had the time to consider the details of such a bill. I have not been thinking of myself, but the people.

Mr. SIMS. We might get your time extended.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I will vote for a proper bill. I mean I will vote for a bill to raise the salary of my successor, even if I was renominated the other day [laughter], and I am willing for the law to take effect four years hence—in the Sixty-first Congress. I have said publicly to my people I favored this increase, and you all know it should be done. We are a lot of moral cowards not to pass a law to raise these salaries and look after this question of mileage, that should be reformed, and bring that down to a common-sense basis. A whole lot of us get a whole lot more mileage than we ought to have, and others, perhaps, do not get enough. The law is a very old one. Conditions have changed. The law should meet the new conditions. Of course a lot of people are opposed to this until you explain to them. A lot of men were opposed to the passage of an amendment to the law against Members riding on railroad passes, and to the enforcement of the law of 1887 to have this evil broken up. On this abusive issuance of railroad passes I want to say——

Mr. BABCOCK. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. BABCOCK. Will the gentleman kindly advise the House where these passes can be obtained at this time? [Laughter.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I do not know where they can be obtained, because I have never asked for any, and those I have received have been returned unless filed away with my letters.

Mr. BABCOCK. You made a statement that Members were riding on free passes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Many did, I know, but I do not know that any do so now. I do not know of anybody who knows, or is supposed to know, more about free passes than the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. BABCOCK. I have no pass, and I pay for every mile that I ride. I should be glad if the gentleman would inform us, because if there is a place where we can get them I would like to have my colleagues know.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I venture the assertion that every Member knows where he can get them, or where he did get them. I am glad to know that the railroads shut down on issuing passes to Tom, Dick, and Harry, because it is against the law—the commerce act of 1887—with certain exceptions, and we ought to enforce the law. I intend to try to do so as long as I can. I received a telegram the other day from a railroad man insisting on a change in the law, or proposed law, so as to allow members of families of railroad employees to ride on free passes.

I think that is a wise policy, Mr. Chairman, for the railroad company to pursue, as far as their employees are concerned. It is a wise, salutory policy for them to cultivate a friendly feeling with their employees.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I move to strike out the last word. I want to explain myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is already talking to a pro forma amendment.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I then ask for two minutes more, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that his time be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I am satisfied that a large majority of Members of Congress agree with me on these propositions; they all know that I am right about it. And yet we are going along in this slipshod way, and it reflects on us as individuals and officials. A few days after this House voted on my antipass amendment to the Hepburn bill a great railroad lawyer introduced himself to me at the hotel, indorsed my antipass crusade, and told me that before he left home he had issued a free pass to every Federal judge in his State and all except one had retained them. One judge, whom I served with in Congress, sent his pass back. The railroad lawyer commended him. The railroad man also told me that he had sent a free pass to every member of the legislature and they had all kept them, and he had also sent one to his governor and to each Member of Congress from his State. I asked him why he disobeyed the law. "You know," said I, "that is contrary to the law in interstate transportation," and asked him why he did it. He said: "I know it's against the law, but we feel like we have to do this." I said: "You think you have to buy your peace and safety in that way?" And he said: "That is the way we feel about it."

Now, Mr. Chairman, that is a reflection and causes reflections to be cast upon the judiciary. It is a reflection upon Members of Congress and it is a reflection upon the governor of that great State and the legislature. That would be true even if this practice was not against the law, because it is otherwise wrong and causes increased fares to be charged to those who buy their tickets.

But I have unintentionally digressed from my subject. I want the teachers to have a good salary and I took the floor to ask why this horizontal rate was proposed and why it is being criticised.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I am very sorry that the gentleman from Tennessee fails to inform the House where transportation could be procured.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It is in your pocket, like it is in mine. My money is all I use.

Mr. BABCOCK. I want to say to the gentleman that there is no transportation in my pocket. I always pay my fare on trains and in street cars.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. You pay on the street cars, of course, but have you always done that?

Mr. BABCOCK. Yes; always.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Then we are on a parity. We pay our way, and yet neither of us is a saint. [Laughter.] I hope that the gentleman from Wisconsin will, when the time comes, vote to cut off this free-pass "abuse." There should be exemptions to certain classes of persons, but the law should be clear and rigorously enforced.

Mr. BABCOCK. I wish to say to the gentleman from Tennessee that in 1889 I offered a bill in the Wisconsin legislature to prohibit the issuing of free passes to anyone. The bill was defeated, but later the State was the first one, I think in the Union to cut off the free transportation.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. But do they enforce the law?

Mr. BABCOCK. Yes; they enforce the law.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am glad to hear that. Under the act of 1887 an investigation of a railroad was had by the Cooley Commission, which admitted it was guilty of issuing passes to "influential" and other people, and the Commission ordered it and all railroads engaged in interstate commerce to stop issuing passes, saying it was against the law, and yet they went right on disobeying the law.

Mr. BABCOCK. The gentleman will not find any railroad companies in Wisconsin issuing passes outside of their own employees.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I rejoice to hear that.

Mr. BABCOCK. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not think this amendment was understood. I was absent at the time it was adopted and I ask that it be read again for the information of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the amendment be again read. Without objection, the Clerk will again read it.

The Clerk again reported the amendment.

Mr. BABCOCK. I understand this amendment was adopted to this bill last District day, and that this is a reconsideration of that vote. Am I correct?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not advised as to the exact situation.

Mr. BURLESON. The amendment is offered as a substitute.

Mr. BABCOCK. It is the same in effect. The gentleman offers it as a substitute for the amendment of two weeks ago.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that is the parliamentary situation—to strike out the three lines as amended and insert in lieu thereof the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BABCOCK. The substitute, as I understand it, is the original provision that was stricken out as amended. Now, I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas a question which is not clearly understood by the House—that is, if he knows just the effect that this amendment would have as to the increase of the salary of the school-teachers—the fifty-five teachers?

Mr. BURLESON. Yes; it practically leaves the salaries just as the bill as reported did, but instead of being placed in classes 1 to 5, which would of course fix their salaries, they are placed in classes 2 to 5, which really gives them a little larger increase; but I had to so frame my amendment for the purpose of making my motion in order.

Mr. BABCOCK. How much was the increase of this amendment?

Mr. BURLESON. The fifty-five?

Mr. BABCOCK. Yes; under the amendment as adopted how much did it increase the appropriation?

Mr. BURLESON. It increased the appropriation for the first year $13,925 and for the second year it increased it to $5,500, and the bill originally provided an increase of $1,275 for the second year and an increase of $1,575 for the first year.

Mr. BABCOCK. How much does the gentleman's amendment increase the original bill?

Mr. BURLESON. It increases it very little indeed, because the original bill provided that they should be within classes 1 to 5. The amendment took them out of those classes and put them arbitrarily in Group A of class 6. I now offer a substitute, by way of amendment, to put them in classes 2 to 5.

Mr. BABCOCK. As I understand that amendment, it simply changed the classification of the teachers, and by that it changed their salaries?

Mr. BURLESON. Certainly.

Mr. SIMS. The amendment that was adopted the other day struck out these very lines and put in others.

Mr. BURLESON. Oh, no. The amendment that was offered the other day simply inserted, after the word "music," as I recollect it, in line 14, page 5, the words "Group A, class 6," and thereby lifted the salaries of fifty-five teachers, some of whom were now receiving only $500, to $1,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the RECORD shows that the bill as amended on the other day read as follows, after it was amended:

Teachers, manual training, drawing, physical culture, music, Group A, class 6, and teachers of domestic science, domestic art, in the graded schools, classes 1 to 5.

Mr. BURLESON. Yes; that is right.

Mr. SIMS. Very well; I misunderstood it. I thought that the amendment struck out some of the language.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The question of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] as to why this bill provided increases of teachers' salaries is an entirely proper one.

I may say that for six years preceding this year sundry increases were made in the salaries of teachers in this District. Six years ago the salaries of teachers in the lower grades were very, very meager. If I remember right, they were for the first year about $300. The committee in charge of the appropriations for the District of Columbia gradually raised those salaries. The committee, however, was fully aware that it had not made harmonious change in those salaries; that it had only remedied a few obvious inequalities.

Last year an effort was made, led by my friend the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. FOSTER], to secure on the floor an increase of salaries for the teachers of the District. At that time I had charge of the District appropriation bill. I had had information from a large number of teachers that the schedule was not wisely planned, and it seemed best not to adopt it. Moreover, the District was carrying a large financial burden for finishing the filtration plant and other things of that kind, and it did not seem the time to make the increases.

But there was a sort of understanding that this year there would be a readjustment and increase of teachers' salaries. This year, with the filtration plant completed and the main sewerage system practically completed, there will be money in the treasury with which to make these proper increases, and for one I am very glad indeed to have them made.

I have looked over with some degree of care the schedule of the salaries to be paid. I was a teacher myself for twenty-one years. It is therefore one of the things that I might perhaps be expected to know a little something about. I think that the general schedule of salaries provided in the bill, while not of course ideal or perfect, is very reasonable and a proper one.

It strikes me that the amendment we adopted two weeks ago (the last District day) was a very unwise one. It made increases that were unjustified and unfair. It strikes me that the substitute offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] is much more equitable, and therefore I am in favor of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the business being transacted here is too important to be transacted without a quorum. I suggest there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri raises the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred Members present—a quorum.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, in order to thoroughly perfect the amendment I offered, I offer the following additional amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, lines 2, 3, and 4, strike out the words "including teachers of drawing, physical culture, music, domestic science, domestic art, and manual training."

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas his reasons for making this amendment.

Mr. BURLESON. In order to make the section conform to the amendment already adopted a moment ago.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, on page 6, line 7, I wish to offer an amendment in order to get an explanation, and that is to strike out the words "librarians and." I wish to make some inquiries in regard to that.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman from New York, I will state that on the last District day a statement was made that the District of Columbia was the only place where school librarians were provided for. On looking over the report of the Commissioner of Education for 1902, I find that there are 5,726 librarians in the public schools of the United States, and that in these libraries there are 3,710,000 volumes. In this same report of the Commissioner of Education, volume 1, pages 771 to 1017, inclusive, will be found the names of hundreds of school librarians, tabulated, with their respective libraries.

Now, as far as New York is concerned, there are librarians in New York at the present time in the high schools.

Boys' high school, corner of Marcy and Putman avenues, has a high school library of 25,304 books, and the high school librarian is D. O'C. Walsh.

Girls' high school, Nostrand avenue, has a high school library of 5,093 books, and the high school librarian is M. Josephine Brink.

Normal school librarians: Eight schools in New York State have normal school librarians—Brockport, Cortland, New Paltz, New York City (2), Oswego, Plattsburg, Potsdam.

High school librarians: New York State, with Brooklyn, is equipped in the following towns with 118 high school librarians: Adams, Afton, Albany, Attica, Auburn, Babylon, Bainbridge, Bay Shore, Belmont, Bergen, Buffalo, Camden, Canajoharie, Carthage, Champlain, Chateaugay, Chittenango, Clarence, Clifton Springs, Clinton, Clyde, Cobleskill, Coldspring, Cooperstown, Copenhagen, Corinth, Cornwall on the Hudson, Coxsackie, Deposit, Dunkirk, East Aurora, East Bloomfield, East Syracuse, Ellington, Fayetteville, Flushing, Fonda, Forestville, Gilbertsville, Gloversville, Goshen, Granville, Great Neck, Greene, Hamburg, Hamilton, Holley, Hornellsville, Jamaica (2), Jamestown, Johnstown, Jordan, Keeseville, Lancaster, Lawrence, Long Island City, Lowville, Manlius, Margaretville, Medina, Mexico, Middleburg, Minerville, Morris, Mount Kisco, Mount Morris, Mount Vernon, Newark Valley, New Hartford, New York City (2), Oneida, Orchard Park, Palmyra, Parish, Patchogue, Perry, Phoenix, Plattsburg, Prattsburg, Richfield Springs, Rochester, Sandy Hill, Saranac Lake, Savannah, Schenectady, Scottsville, Sherburne, Sherman, Sidney, Silver Creek, South Glens Falls, Spring Valley, Stillwater, Syracuse, Tarrytown, Ticonderoga, Troy, Unadilla, Union Springs, Valatie, Victor, Warrensburg, Warsaw, Watervliet, Waverly, Webster, Weedsport, Westfield, Whitehall, Wilson, Windsor, Worcester, and Yonkers.

Elementary school librarians: New York State, outside of Brooklyn, is equipped with elementary librarians in the following cities: Albany, Alexander, Allegany, Ballston Spa, Batavia, Belleville, Binghamton, Brentwood, Cambridge, Ceylon, Chester, Cohoes, Corning, Cornwall on the Hudson, Cortland, Elmira, Fort Edward, Fredonia, Glens Falls, Gowanda, Hartwick, Holland, Homer, Hoosick Falls, Horseheads, Huntington, Islip, Limestone, Lyons, Malone, Mechanicsville, Middletown, Newark, New Brighton, New York City (4), and New York Mills.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me ask the gentleman a question. The boys' high school of Brooklyn has over 25,000 volumes.

Mr. MORRELL. Well, there are 25,000 books in the libraries here.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How many books are in the library connected with the board of education in the District?

Mr. MORRELL. You mean in the District of Columbia. I will give you that in a moment. They aggregate about 25,000 volumes altogether in the different libraries. In the Central High School there are approximately 5,000 volumes. In the Eastern High School there are about 5,000 books and pamphlets; in the Western High School there are 1,600; in the M Street High School there are 1,500. The library of the board of education consists of 10,000 volumes, and the Sumner School, the Richard Gillam, has a library that approximates 4,000 volumes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The schools here in the District of Columbia?

Mr. MORRELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The superintendent of education before the Committee on Appropriations made this statement. He was asked: "Do you mean to say you furnish a library for the teachers?"

Mr. STUART. A small pedagogical library. The annual investment for this out of the contingent fund would be about $150 for books and $50 for magazines, which of course is very small.

Mr. GILLETT. Where is that?

Mr. STUART. At the Franklin School. In fact, there are two—one at the Franklin and one at the Sumner for the colored school, which suggests, of course, this duplication of the two systems and duplication of expense.

The superintendent of education stated that there were these two small, insignificant libraries connected with the school system.

Mr. MORRELL. If the gentleman will allow an interruption, that probably refers to the graded schools. I have referred to the high schools only. I did not take into account the libraries belonging to the graded schools at all.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman state these libraries contain the number of volumes in the District that he has read?

Mr. MORRELL. This was furnished me by the superintendent of schools, Mr. A. T. Stuart. I received a letter from him a couple of days ago containing the figures I have quoted.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, I want to say I believe the statement made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania is substantially correct, as I have investigated it. I want also to say that the girls' high school of Brooklyn contains only 5,093 volumes and is located on Nostrand avenue, that city.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not question the accuracy of the statement. I read from the statement of the superintendent of schools before the Committee on Appropriations. When asked whether there were libraries furnished to the teachers, he said there were merely these small pedagogical libraries, containing mostly, as I understand, books of reference, not books of general reading. There was an effort made by the Carnegie Library to establish branch libraries in some of the schools, but I do not know whether that has been done. The information I had led me to believe there were no libraries, otherwise than as I have stated, in the schools.

Mr. GOULDEN. I think that my colleague from New York will believe, if there are libraries containing the number of volumes as provided in the District schools and stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that they should have a librarian. I believe it is really needed, and I know the gentleman from New York desires to have that done.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can be heard in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. I am in opposition to the amendment. The amendment, as I understand it, is to strike out the words "librarian and."

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will say to the gentleman from Minnesota, in view of the explanation given by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I will withdraw my amendment with the permission of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not hear the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I say in view of the explanation made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania I wish to withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. If I understand it now, Mr. Chairman, that restores the words "librarian and."

The CHAIRMAN. It leaves the bill precisely as it was read. The amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. Pardon my dullness.

Mr. BABCOCK. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has withdrawn the amendment.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. So that the bill reads as it was originally printed?

The CHAIRMAN. Precisely.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. McCLEARY] or the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON], one or the other—it does not make a bit of difference which—if there is not something unfair about these schedules as to grades 6 and 7. They do not seem to get any increase at all, or a very small one. I had an amendment prepared, but I can not find it, relating to this subject.

My understanding, to explain the question, is that promotion seems to be rapid from grade 1 up to grades 5 and 6, but as soon as you strike grades 6 and 7 there seems to be a stoppage of the increase of salary. And there ought to be some kind of a provision in here somewhere for increase based on longevity. The gentleman is more familar with the bill than I am, and I would like to ask him if it is not true that the teachers in grades 6 and 7 do not get any increase in salary in proportion to these other grades?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state there is no proposition pending before the committee.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I move to strike out the last word of whatever is before the committee, so that I can get information from either one of these gentlemen.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I will state to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] that I am not a member of the committee that prepared this bill, but as I understand it the provision that is made for the eighth grade teachers under the terms of this bill is very satisfactory to the eighth grade teachers.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Sixth and seventh grades.

Mr. BURLESON. And the same with reference to the sixth and seventh grades, too, as I understand it. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORRELL] has charge of the bill and can probably answer that much more satisfactorily.

Mr. MORRELL. I did not hear the question.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The question is this: Under the terms of this bill do the teachers of grades six and seven get any increase that is anything like in proportion to the increase that the others get?

Mr. MORRELL. Does the gentleman refer in that question to the increases contained in class 6?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am not talking about classes, but am talking about grades.

Mr. MORRELL. They all receive an increase, as the gentleman will see if he reads a little further. In section 6 it shows exactly how the amount is increased. Each teacher to begin with receives an annual increase within his group or class, and must receive at least $25 the first year.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is it not true that under the schedule here that a teacher that has only taught one or two years gets an increase greater than the teacher who has taught several years, if they happen to be in grades six or seven? Is that the place where the promotion seems to stop?

Mr. MORRELL. No, sir. In answer to the gentleman I may say that that was not the idea of the committee or is the operation of the schedules.

Mr. BURLESON. With the permission of the gentleman from Pennsylvania I think I can give him the information he asks. A sixth or seventh grade teacher is placed in class 4. If that teacher is engaged in the first year's service, he or she will receive $800, the second year $830, the third year $860, the fourth year $890, an increase each year of $30 per year until it reaches the maximum number of years provided for in this bill. It is substantially the same degree of increase that is given to the teachers in the other grades. For instance, in the eighth grade they start the teacher, if she is a first year's teacher—if it is her first year of service—at $950, the next year at $980, the third year of service $1,030, and the fourth of service $1,070, and so on. I think it is a very fair bill considering all of the circumstances under which it has been brought before the committee.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I want to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORRELL] another question. Is there any provision at all in this arrangement here for an increase of what they call "longevity pay?"

Mr. MORRELL. No, sir; there is not, except so far as Group B is concerned. Group B, in class 6—the teacher who demonstrates special excellence may be promoted into Group B, but there is no increase provided beyond the ten years on the basis of longevity.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is up at the head of the column?

Mr. MORRELL. Under this bill they can receive an increase of salary only for ten years.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, as a matter of fact, promotions are rapid from grade 1 until you strike grade 6, and then promotions are slower. It seems to be a sort of stopping place, and what the teachers want is some kind of provision for longevity pay. I do not believe a teacher necessarily becomes better, or that all of them become better, because of teaching for a long time; but if they are fit to teach in the beginning, they surely do become more efficient as the years go by.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] has expired.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question, reverting to these librarians. I would like to know how many librarians there are in the schools?

Mr. MORRELL. At present there are seven librarians, but they are not known as librarians. They do clerical work, and some of them do teaching work. They are rated as teachers and come in under a salary class in the appropriation bill of so many teachers at so much per annum. I think the gentleman will remember that manner of division and appropriation in the appropriation bill.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. That is what I wish to find out. Those who are now appropriated for as teachers are rendering service as librarians?

Mr. MORRELL. Yes; in a certain few cases.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. And there are about seven of them?

Mr. MORRELL. About seven.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. And this bill means to leave those seven and does not create any new ones?

Mr. MORRELL. It does not create any new ones whatsoever.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That the board of education shall classify all academic and scientific subjects in the Central, Eastern, Western, and Business high schools, and the McKinley Manual Training School into eight departments, so that each department shall contain correlated subjects, and the same shall be done with respect to the M Street High School and the Armstrong Manual Training School.

Whenever a department includes two or more high schools then the teacher in charge of the department shall be designated "head of the department;" otherwise the teacher in charge of the department shall be designated "head teacher."

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 6, line 17, strike out all after the word "the," down to and including the word "school," in line 19, and insert instead the words "M Street High School and the Armstrong Manual Training School shall be similarly classified in the five departments, so that each department may contain correlated subjects.

Mr. MORRELL. I call for a vote, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the reason for the proposed amendment.

Mr. MORRELL. In answer to the gentleman from New York, I will state that the reason for that was simply to equalize the colored and the white high schools. Of course the gentleman realizes there are only two colored high schools, whereas there are four white high schools.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That the board of education shall arrange all teachers in the classes and groups in the above schedule, except as hereinafter specified.

For the year ending June 30, 1907, each head of department and teacher shall receive the salary in his class next above his present salary. If promoted to a higher class, he shall receive the salary in that class next above his present salary, and after June 30, 1907, if his work is satisfactory, he shall receive an annual increase within his class or group, as herein provided, without action of the board of education; but no teacher shall in any one year receive more than one promotion within his class or group: Provided, That if the salary in his class next above his present salary shall be less than $25 in excess of his present salary, he shall receive the next higher salary, so that no teacher shall receive for the first year an increase of less than $25.

A teacher shall not be promoted from one class to another, or from one group in class 6 to another, or from one grade of salary to another within Group B, except by the board of education, upon the recommendation of the supervisor of high schools; or, in the case of colored teachers, upon the recommendation of the colored assistant superintendent, or supervising principal having supervision of the teacher. Such recommendations shall in each case be made through and with the approval of the superintendent of schools.

Teachers shall be promoted for superior work from Group A to Group B as follows:

First. All high school teachers upon the recommendation of the supervisor of high schools in the case of white high schools, or upon the recommendation of the colored assistant superintendent in the case of colored high schools.

Second. Upon the recommendation of the director of manual training in the case of manual training schools.

Third. Upon the recommendation of the principal of the normal schools in the case of the normal schools.

Such recommendations shall in each case be made through and with the approval of the superintendent of schools.

No teacher, principal, or supervising principal shall be appointed to any position in the graded schools, high schools, manual training schools, or normal schools, or no director, assistant director, and teacher of special studies shall be appointed until they have passed an examination prescribed by the board. This provision shall not apply to teachers coming from the normal schools, or teachers being advanced from the different classes in the grade schools, or from one group to another in the high, normal, or manual training schools.

Every new teacher at the time of his appointment shall be assigned to a class or group by the board of education on the recommendation of the superintendent of schools, and shall receive for the first year the minimum pay of said class or group. The first year in Group A, class 6, shall be probationary.

For the purpose of this act a model teacher shall be held to be a teacher of the first or second grade, whose special aptitude for primary teaching makes it desirable to retain him in said grades with the pay of a higher grade.

Teachers of classes 1 and 2 shall receive an annual increase of salary of $25 for four years.

Teachers of class 3 shall receive an annual increase of salary of $25 for ten years.

Teachers of class 4 shall receive an annual increase of salary of $30 for ten years.

Teachers of class 5 shall receive an annual increase of salary of $40 for ten years.

Teachers in Group A of class 6, after the probationary year, shall receive an annual increase of salary of $100 for eight years; in Group B, of $100 for three years.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 23, on page 8, after the word "schools," insert the following words: "Provided, That no teacher or officer in the service of the public schools of the District of Columbia at the time of the passage of this act shall be required to take any examination, either mental of physical, to be continued in the service;" thus making the paragraph read as follows:

"No teacher, principal, or supervising principal shall be appointed to any position in the graded schools, high schools, manual training schools, or normal schools, or no director, assistant director, or teacher of special studies shall be appointed until they have passed an examination prescribed by the board. This provision shall not apply to teachers coming from the normal schools, or teachers being advanced from the different classes in the grade schools, or from one group to another in the high, normal, or manual training schools: Provided, That no teacher or officer in the service of the public schools of the District of Columbia at the time of the passage of this act shall be required to take any examination, either mental or physical, to be continued in the service."

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, on behalf of the committee I accept the amendment.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania upon what authority he accepts the amendment just offered? If we have incompetent teachers in the public schools in this District, surely it ought to be the purpose of every gentleman here to have them weeded out; and while we are passing a bill providing for a reorganization of the public school system in this city, if I may so denominate it, and properly to increase the salaries of the teachers, why is it, if we now have any incompetent teachers, that we should not allow the school board to take advantage of the opportunity to drop them out of the public service.

I have heard, Mr. Chairman, and I invite the gentleman from Pennsylvania to answer, whether he thinks the rumors are without foundation, that there has been a persistent effort upon the part of some to fill the public schools of this town with teachers from their districts—appointees by pull—who are absolutely without qualifications to teach. And now, Mr. Chairman, is it possible that the taxpayers and inhabitants of this District, whose deep concern it is to improve the teaching force in their schools, when the effort is being made by us to reform this system of public education, are to again be made, or rather continue to be made, the victims of this, if I may so term it, species of political graft? I must confess I can not understand why the gentleman in charge of the bill will so readily accept the amendment if there is any foundation for these rumors. Surely this bill was prepared most carefully by the District Committee; and they ought not to object to letting it stand intact, as they have drawn and reported it.

Mr. Chairman, if there be truth in these rumors, then the gentleman ought to be the first one to rush to the rescue for the protection of the school system of this District and resist the amendment offered.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BURLESON. Certainly; I will with pleasure.

Mr. PAYNE. Is it not the law that all teachers appointed to the public schools in the city of Washington must have graduated from a normal school or passed an examination before they can get positions as teachers?

Mr. BURLESON. I am not prepared to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. MORRELL. I should like to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. BURLESON. I am not prepared to deny the first proposition in the question of the gentleman from New York, that the law regulates the appointment of teachers in the District; but if what I have heard is true, I must emphatically deny the last part of his query. I understand that a mere stripling, who has never graduated from a normal school, who has never graduated even from the high school, because of some influence from some quarter has been elevated to a most important position in the public school system of this city. If it is true, it is a disgrace to this Congress that it should be permitted to continue any longer than we can correct it, and surely this amendment does not tend in that direction?

Mr. PAYNE. But they do pass examinations?

Mr. BURLESON. Not always, so I hear.

If these rumors are not true, surely the gentleman who has been so earnest in his efforts to perfect the bill ought to know it, and if they are true, then the evil ought to be thoroughly corrected before any such amendment as this offered by the gentleman from Michigan is adopted. If that amendment prevails, then of course the old practice will obtain and be given the sanction of legislative enactment.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman from Texas, I may say that the committee framed that paragraph of the bill simply to prevent the abuse which he has outlined, and on which some information came to the committee room that it did exist. Now, the only effect of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan is to provide that the teachers now in the service shall not be subject to an examination immediately on the passage of this bill. Of course the superintendent of schools and board of education are at liberty at any time to remove any teacher. And if the gentleman from Texas seems to think that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan will in any way lessen the effect and force of the paragraph, why, I do not accept it, because it was the desire of the committee to protect as far as possible the school system, particularly in view of raising the salaries, because we know as soon as we put the salaries up to a high notch that at once teachers would flock here from other places instead of them being drawn away, as they have in the past, and that we would be perhaps loaded down with teachers of inferior ability. I therefore withdraw my consent to accepting the amendment.

Mr. BURLESON. I felt sure the gentleman from Pennsylvania had no purpose other than to promote the efficiency of the school system in this city. As I caught the reading of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan, it was intended by law to continue in the service of the schools all teachers and officers now employed therein. I thought I was right in thus interpreting the amendment. If I am mistaken in his purpose I withdraw any statement made by me with reference thereto; but if I did catch his purpose it was to save all those now in the public school service from a test of their qualifications. That is what I thought it meant. If I am mistaken about it I withdraw my remarks and am glad to do so. But if I am not mistaken I believe the amendment ought to be voted down, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania is eminently wise in withdrawing his acceptance of same.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman yield? I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question.

Mr. MORRELL. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GOULDEN. I want to ask the gentleman whether he is to be understood as admitting the correctness of the statement made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON]?

Mr. MORRELL. I do not admit what I have no actual knowledge of. The same rumor reached me as reached the gentleman from Texas. But it was not the province of the committee to go into the question of whether the public school-teachers are competent or incompetent. The best proof of competency of the public school-teachers in the District of Columbia is the fact that within the last thirteen months over seventy of them have gone from Washington to accept a higher salary in other cities.

Mr. GOULDEN. I say, Mr. Chairman, that I dislike very much indeed to believe any portion of the statement made by the gentleman from Texas, based upon mere rumors.

Mr. BURLESON. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. GOULDEN. I was one of these "meddling outsiders" who thought something in the way of change was needed in the school system of the District of Columbia, and therefore I introduced the bill; but I had no idea that any such rumors as that were afloat, and if they were I hoped for the good name of the members of the board of education, as well as for the good name of the city of Washington, that they were simply rumors and nothing else.

Mr. BURLESON. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. GOULDEN. I will.

Mr. BURLESON. The gentleman says that he had no idea that any such rumors were afloat, and asks the gentleman from Pennsylvania if he is to be understood as admitting the correctness of my statement. I now ask the gentleman if he is prepared to deny it?

Mr. GOULDEN. I have heard some pretty severe strictures on the administration of the affairs of the public schools in the city of Washington, but I never heard anything quite so severe as that stated by the gentleman from Texas; but, as I understand it, he says they are only rumors.

Mr. BURLESON. Certainly, and I so stated; I do not vouch for the truthfulness of them, but if the gentleman wants to know whether I credit them or not, I will not hesitate to give him an expression on that point.

Mr. GOULDEN. I would like to have the gentleman state his views.

Mr. BURLESON. I believe that the rumors are true, and for that reason, and that reason alone, I oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. GOULDEN. I think the gentleman is right in opposing the amendment. I do not think the amendment should be acted upon favorably. There ought to be some degree of merit in the promotions, and the amendment does not help matters. The paragraph as it stands is all right.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the amendment read again.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, if the gentlemen of this committee will recall their own experience as students they will remember with what nervousness they approached examinations. Teachers are only children grown tall. If there is anything more nerve wearing to a teacher than any other, it is to feel that at any day, or any hour, at the whim of some person, they may be subjected to an examination.

I would like to ask what better possible examination there is than is found in the daily service of the teacher. The purpose of an examination when a teacher comes to a school for the first time is to ascertain his probable qualifications. But that examination at best is a very unsatisfactory thing.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. GOULDEN. Does not the gentleman, from his long experience in the schools, consider that the daily work of the teachers is the best practical examination or test that can be applied?

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. That is the point I am trying to make.

Mr. GOULDEN. We in New York make that the real test.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. That is the point I am making. The daily service of the teacher is the best test that can be had.

I have no interest in this matter except the good of the schools, and to save the nerve forces of the teachers, which, in the faithful discharge of their daily duties, have a sufficient drain. And I therefore suggest that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan is emphatically right. The teachers were examined before they were admitted to the service. At any time, if their work is not satisfactory, they can be demoted or dismissed. That power is vested in those who control the schools.

Why hang over the head of these teachers the terror—for that is the only word to express it—of an examination that may take them out of the field of their usual subjects of consideration and unnerve them for weeks and months? I think the wise thing to do is to examine them rigidly in the first place and assume that that examination has been fairly conducted, then put them upon their merits as exhibited by their work, and let it rest there. Therefore it seems to me that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH] is right and should be adopted.

Just one word more. Let me suggest this, that the proposed examination would be conducted by the very same people who have to pass upon the merits of the teachers, so you are only substituting a nerve-wearing method of examination for a natural one.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I understand upon examination of this amendment that all there is to it is the proviso in the last four lines; that the other is simply a repetition of the paragraph in the bill. This proviso says that no teacher or officer in the service of the public schools of the District of Columbia at the time of the passage of this act shall be required to take any examination, either mental or physical, to be continued in the service. That is all there is to the amendment.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. Certainly, and it seems to me that the amendment should be adopted.

Mr. BABCOCK. The other part is a repetition and that is the amendment.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. And that amendment I approve.

Mr. GREENE. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the amendment is right and proper. It simply provides so as to make it a little plainer than it is now that there shall be no new examination for teachers who are at present in the service. I think that is the custom in nearly all cities; it is the custom prevailing in nearly all of the public service, and I think it would be entirely wrong to subject all these teachers now in the schools to an examination. I do not think it would be expected anyway, but that makes the bill more clear. There is no harm in the amendment; it is a good amendment.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. What means are now provided for getting rid of an incompetent teacher?

Mr. GREENE. The board can remove an incompetent teacher if they find the teacher to be incompetent, but there is need to provide in the bill that the teachers shall not be subject to an examination because of the passage of this bill. That is all there is to the amendment.

Mr. LITTAUER. What reason can be given for putting in this provision?

Mr. GREENE. It is simply to provide that the passage of this bill shall not be so construed as to compel teachers to subject themselves to a further examination.

Mr. LITTAUER. I can not see how the gentleman can take that inference from this provision. Here is a mandate that there shall be no examination. Why not leave it as it is now? What is the necessity for this provision?

Mr. GREENE. It is necessary to define it positively.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Under the law to-day has the board of education the right to compel a teacher to take an examination in order to determine whether that teacher is competent or not?

Mr. GREENE. I do not think it has at all.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Then I ask, under the present powers of the board, suppose some teacher is reported as inefficient; is there any power now vested in the board to compel the teacher to submit himself or herself to an examination?

Mr. GREENE. I think the board could determine whether the teacher is efficient or not.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, I think that this is an implied power that rests in the board and in the superintendent of schools. I am quite sure that the board would have the power as it is now constituted to order and authorize an examination of a teacher who in the estimation of the supervisors and the superintendent of schools was not up to the standard.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If this amendment is adopted that implied power in the board will be taken away so far as every teacher now in the schools is concerned, and will exist as to all future appointees in the school system. I call the attention of the gentleman to this fact, that so far as the pending bill is concerned there is no provision from which any authority can be spelled out for the board to even dismiss these teachers.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, I think the meaning of the amendment is that an examination shall not become necessary simply by operation of the passage of the bill, but it does not imply to my mind that an examination could not be ordered by the board of education in the case of an alleged incompetent teacher.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This amendment says specifically that none shall be required in order to continue in the service.

Mr. MORRELL. By operation of the bill?

Mr. GREENE. By operation of the passage of the bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But it does not say that. Let the gentleman put that in his amendment and it will do away with all objection, I think.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, then I would move to amend the amendment by inserting the words "by operation of the passage of this bill."

Mr. GREENE. Mr. Chairman, I want to say further that if any teacher should become incompetent, or if the teacher should become insane, or from any other reason unfit to remain as a teacher, the board would have ample authority to remove that teacher.

Mr. LITTAUER. Where is that provision giving the board that authority?

Mr. GREENE. In the rules and regulations and in common sense.

Mr. LITTAUER. Oh, but not in the bill.

Mr. GREENE. Not in the bill. It does not take anything out of the present law. The rules of the board and common sense will take care of all that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. BURLESON. I just want to propound a query to those gentlemen who say the teachers have been already examined—that they are already in the service of the public schools by virtue of examinations. If that is so, I want to know if the gentleman who offered this amendment will accept this amendment, which I now offer:

Provided, That this provision shall not apply to any teacher or officer who was not admitted into the service of the public schools in accordance with the requirements of law and the regulations of the board of education.

Will the gentleman accept that as an amendment to his amendment? If so, I will withdraw the objection I have urged against it. If he does not accept it, it certainly makes it plain to every man upon this floor who is not willfully blind that there are people connected with the public school system in this town who have been pushed in there by influence, and it is now proposed to keep them there, under this amendment, by virtue of legislative enactment.

Mr. MORRELL. I would suggest to the gentleman from Texas that the amendment be reported by the Clerk, so that the gentleman from Michigan may decide as to whether or not he will accept it.

Mr. SIMS. Before that is done I want to ask this question: The chairman of the committee announces that nearly all the proposed amendment is a lot of whereases. Now, I would like to know what is the real amendment and why we should discuss anything else?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. BURLESON. I fear the Clerk could not read it to save his immortal soul, so I will read it myself. I move to amend the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan by adding thereto the following words:

Provided, That this provision shall not apply to any teacher or officer who was not admitted into the service of the public schools in accordance with the requirements of law and the regulations of the board of education.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman be kind enough to send his amendment to the desk?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I hope that that amendment will not prevail.

Mr. SIMS. Which amendment?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. The amendment which has just been offered by the gentleman from Texas ought not to prevail. I think we ought to be exceedingly careful here in throwing out reflections upon public school-teachers or the board of education which may arise from mere idle rumors in the community. This is an impeachment, first, to the teachers themselves, that they are not competent, and, second, that they have come in in an irregular way. The chairman of the committee says that the board of education, having charge of the schools, has the authority to dismiss an incompetent. I would go further than that. The board have not only the authority, but it is their duty, as soon as they find an incompetent teacher, not in the grades covered by the gentleman's amendment, but in any grade, to dismiss that teacher forthwith, whatever may be the influence back of him or her; and to say that the board of education is keeping a lot of incompetents or one incompetent because of somebody's influence here in the House or elsewhere is an impeachment of that board upon mere rumor, and the gentleman says it is a rumor and nothing more. He does an injustice to himself, to the teachers, to the board and the public school system of the city, and I hope that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas will be voted down and that of the gentleman from Michigan will prevail. You will not eliminate these teachers by saying that they are incompetent and the board holds them there. They will not be removed by an examination. As the gentleman from Minnesota well says, they are daily taking an examination which is the very best, in practical work—namely, by filling the place to which they are assigned acceptably. If so, that ought to settle the question. If they are not, the board is derelict in its duty now, and we have the right to assume would be derelict if they undertook to examine them in the face of present knowledge and practical experience.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I want to oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan, but not upon the ground that there is any suspicion or rumor or anything of the sort, but I am afraid it will not act well provided there are teachers who have been simply put in by the power of the board to do so.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. May I ask the gentleman a question? On page 8, line 15 down to line 24, I think that was written in the bill to make it clear that teachers should not have to take an examination, and the only object of that proviso was to make it clearer.

Mr. SIMS. Now, this is the point——

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. If you want these teachers——

Mr. SIMS. I believe that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH] was not on the subcommittee?

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Oh, no.

Mr. SIMS. Neither was I; therefore I am not familiar with the language. But I understood the subcommittee that had charge of this bill has carefully weighed all of the language in the bill, and that it was a harmonious whole. Does the bill require those who are now employed to be examined?

Mr. MORRELL. In answer to the gentleman from Tennessee I will say that it does not in any way, shape, or form.

Mr. SIMS. Then why add this amendment?

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. There are those who differed with the chairman of the committee as to the clearness of the language.

Mr. SIMS. If the bill does not require the teachers who are now employed to be examined hereafter, why would the board assume that they should be examined?

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. It was the intention of the subcommittee to submit a report in which that was not required, and while we intended to do it it is claimed by some that the language from line 15, on page 8, down to line 23 does not make it as clear as a proviso of that kind would make it.

Mr. SIMS. As stated by the chairman of the subcommittee, who, as we know, has devoted many days and months to studying this bill, there is not a word in this bill that requires the teachers now employed to be examined, and here we are proposing to put in a long amendment providing that they shall not be examined. On its very face it carries some reason for suspicion.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] has expired.

Mr. SIMS. I hope the amendment will be defeated, because I think it is superfluous and unnecessary.

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH] a question. Are these teachers appointed annually or appointed once and then hold on until removed?

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I can not tell you.

Mr. MORRELL. That is the system. They are appointed and remain as long as they show their ability to teach and are satisfactory.

Mr. PAYNE. Then I do not see why the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH] offered this amendment.

Mr. SIMS. That is what I do not see.

Mr. PAYNE. The language is:

No teacher, principal, or supervising principal shall be appointed to any position in the graded schools, high schools, manual-training schools, or normal schools, or no director, assistant director, and teacher of special studies shall be appointed until they have passed an examination prescribed by the board.

These teachers do not have to be reappointed. They have already been appointed. It says further:

This provision shall not apply to teachers coming from the normal schools or teachers being advanced from the different classes in the grade schools, or from one group to another in the high, normal, or manual-training schools.

That seems to accomplish what the gentleman from Michigan has in mind.

Mr. MORRELL. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] if he sees anything in that provision which he has just read that would imply that an examination would become necessary, or might be, on the passage of this bill?

Mr. PAYNE. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH].

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Michigan whether, in his judgment, it would not be well to say, "by reason of this act." I made the remarks I did with the thought in mind that the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH] was really a constructive amendment, so that in construing this act there should be no doubt the teachers would be free from this anxiety.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. That is all the object of the amendment.

Mr. MORRELL. I may say that I offer the following amendment; that, after the word "that," insert "by the operation of this act."

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I accept that amendment. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] will be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORRELL].

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert, after the word "that," the words "by the operation of this act." So as to read: "That by the operation of this act no teacher or other officer in the service," etc.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. These words will be put later, namely: "No teacher, by the operation of this act." It is a matter of syntax.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON].

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORRELL] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH].

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, I request that the Clerk read the amendment, together with the amendment offered by myself.

The CHAIRMAN. By unanimous consent, the Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH] and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORRELL].

The Clerk read the amendments.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, that does not read as the gentleman from Pennsylvania intends it. The phrase "by the operation of this act" should come in later.

The CHAIRMAN. Where does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORRELL] desire his amendment to be inserted, namely, "by the operation of this act?"

Mr. MORRELL. I suggest that the Clerk read the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

That no teacher or officer in the service of the public schools of the District of Columbia at the time of the passage of this act shall, by the operation of this act, be required to take any examination, either mental or physical, to be continued in the service.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORRELL].

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH] as amended by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORRELL].

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding, after the word "salary," line 6, page 7, the following:

And no teacher or principal shall in any event receive less than his or her present salary.

Mr. MORRELL. What is the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. BURLESON. I do not think the gentleman from Pennsylvania will object to accepting that amendment.

Mr. MORRELL. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON].

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. I would like to have the sentence read as it will appear in the law.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the year ending June 30, 1907, each head of department and teacher shall receive the salary in his class next above his present salary, and no teacher or principal shall in any event receive less than his or her present salary.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON].

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That principals of grade school buildings shall receive for services rendered as such, in addition to their grade salary, the yearly sum of $30 for each session room in the building.

The term "session room" shall be held to designate a class room in which the regular work of a class is carried on.

Principals of normal, high, and manual training schools shall receive a salary of $2,000 per annum, together with an annual increase of $100 for ten years. All principals shall be appointed at the minimum salary.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 10, line 2, after the word "class," insert the words "of not less than twenty-five people."

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, before the amendment is reported, I would like to call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the fact that the word "class" occurs twice in that line. The gentleman ought to designate which one he desires his amendment to come in after, because it makes no sense by coming after the word "class" the first time it occurs.

Mr. MORRELL. It comes after the word "class" the second time it appears.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that his amendment shall be understood as applying after the word "class" the second time it occurs in that line.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 10, line 6, strike out the word "ten" and insert the word "five;" so as to read "five years."

Mr. BURLESON. The object of this amendment is to prevent an increase of the salary beyond the period of five years' service. The minimum salary of the principals of the normal, high, and manual training schools is $2,000 per annum. The bill gives them each an increase of salary of $100 per year for ten years under its terms, or a maximum salary of $3,000. If the amendment I offer is adopted it will give only a maximum salary of $2,500. There is no person upon this floor more earnestly in favor of paying the teachers of the city of Washington a fair compensation for their services than I am, but I earnestly invite the attention of gentlemen of the District committee and the attention of gentlemen of the House to the fact that there are very few normal schools throughout this country that pay the principals thereof higher salaries than $2,500 per annum. In a few of the larger States—in Illinois, in New York——

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. BURLESON. Certainly.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I want to say further that there are but very few colleges or universities in this country that pay a maximum salary of $2,500 after many years of service has demonstrated distinguished ability. There are very few.

Mr. BURLESON. I thank the gentleman for the suggestion. I am thoroughly familiar with the fact that that is the case. Permit me to direct attention to Johns Hopkins University, admittedly one of the greatest universities in our country; many of the ablest men connected with that institution as professors receive less than $3,000 per annum. As a matter of fact, if we under the provisions of this bill provide ultimately that the principals of the high schools and manual training school and the normal school shall receive $2,500 per annum, we will be making a generous provision for them, and I do not hesitate to say we would not take this action but for the fact that the Government bears half the burden. I submit the amendment to the committee for their determination.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, division!

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 39, noes 14.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No quorum, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri raises the point of no quorum. The Chair will count.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I withdraw that point.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws the point of no quorum. The ayes have it, and the amendment is carried.

The Clerk read as follows:

DIRECTORS.

SEC. 8. That the salary of the directors shall be as follows: Directors of drawing, physical culture, music, domestic science, domestic art, and kindergartens shall receive a salary of $1,500 per annum, with an annual increase of $50 per year for ten years; the assistant directors of drawing, physical culture, music, domestic science, domestic art, and kindergartens, in charge of colored schools, shall receive a salary of $1,300 per annum, with an annual increase of $50 per year for ten years; the director of primary instruction shall receive a salary of $1,600 per year, with an increase of $50 per year for ten years; the assistant director or primary instruction, in charge of colored schools, shall receive a salary of $1,400, with an increase of $50 per year for ten years. Directors and assistant directors shall be appointed at the minimum salary.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 10, line 13, strike out the word "ten" and insert the word "five."

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, this amendment relates to the salaries ultimately to be paid to the directors of drawing, physical culture, music, domestic science, domestic art—which means cooking and sewing—and kindergartens. Under the terms of this bill they are each to receive a salary of $1,500 per annum with an annual increase of $50 per annum for ten years—that is, as now provided by the bill. I move to strike out "ten" and insert "five," so as to fix the maximum salary this class of teachers is to receive at the expiration of five years. It does not reduce the salary provided in the bill to be paid the teacher when the bill is passed, but the effect of the amendment is that at the expiration of five years the increase is stopped. The director of sewing is now receiving very much less than the salary she is to receive the first year after the passage of this bill. Under this bill she would ultimately, after five years, receive a salary of $1,750. I assert without fear, absolutely without fear of contradiction upon the part of any man upon this floor, that in no State of this Union can there be found a director of domestic science, a director of domestic art, who is receiving any such compensation. I am in favor of giving these directors liberal compensation. I recognize the fact that they are rendering great service; but I do insist, Mr. Chairman, that occasionally, if only occasionally, we should keep in mind that our constituents at home are paying one-half of all that is going to the teachers and officers of this city, and that the helpless taxpayer, who can not even make his voice heard because he is disfranchised, the decitizenized taxpayer in the District of Columbia, must bear the other half of the burden. I appeal to the common sense of the membership of this House. I do not believe the gentleman from Pennsylvania himself will raise his voice in opposition to this amendment.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, this amendment follows logically upon the other, otherwise you will be paying the directors of domestic science, cooking, sewing, manual training, a subordinate, as much as you are paying the principal. Under this amendment he or she will receive $1,750 as the maximum for that work, which I submit, as the gentleman from Texas has said, is a fairly remunerative salary for the kind of work done, and I hope the amendment will prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 18, 21, and 24 strike out the word "ten" and insert the word "five."

Mr. BURTON of Delaware. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the reading of the section as it would read if amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That the salary of the directors shall be as follows: Directors of drawing, physical culture, music, domestic science, domestic art, and kindergartens shall receive a salary of $1,500 per annum with an annual increase of $50 per year for five years; the assistant directors of drawing, physical culture, music, domestic science, domestic art, and kindergartens, in charge of colored schools, shall receive a salary of $1,300 per annum, with an annual increase of $50 per year for five years; the director of primary instruction shall receive a salary of $1,600 per year, with an increase of $50 per year for five years; the assistant director of primary instruction, in charge of colored schools, shall receive a salary of $1,400, with an increase of $50 per year for five years. Directors and assistant directors shall be appointed at the minimum salary.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendments offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken; and the amendments were agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to go back to section 2 for the purpose of offering a small amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to recur to section 2 for the purpose of offering a small amendment.

Mr. [illegible]MS. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask what the amendment is?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. To provide that when a teacher is on trial or under investigation that he or she shall have the right to attend it, accompanied by counsel and at least one friend.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I believe I will object to returning to that section.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Then I believe I will raise the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri raises the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] More than 100 Members present. The Clerk will read.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 11, line 4, after the word "dollars," insert the word "each." Also strike out the words, in line 4, "the superintendent of buildings and supplies, $3,600."

Mr. MORRELL. That office has been abolished.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 11, line 9, strike out the word "ten" and insert the word "five;" so that it will read: "with an increase of $100 per year for five years."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out lines 14 and 15.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 11 strike out lines 14 and 15.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to call the attention of the committee to the fact that the bill provides that the supervisor of high schools shall for the first year receive $2,600, in these lines that I move to strike out. The bill in another section provides that the supervisors of high schools and other designated supervisors shall receive $2,200. There is an apparent contradiction in the provision giving them $2,200. Evidently this was inserted through an oversight.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, I accept the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York in view of the fact that the supervisor of the high school gets $1,800 now and will get $2,000 by the operation of the other provision.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk as an additional section to be inserted after section 9.

The Clerk read as follows:

When a teacher is on trial or being investigated he or she shall have the right to be attended by counsel and by at least one friend of his or her selection.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of my amendment is so reasonable and just that it appears to be a waste of time to say anything about it. It is a constitutional right of every American citizen to appear in person when charged with misconduct and meet his accuser face to face, also to be represented by counsel. These are valuable rights, and the teachers of the District of Columbia should not be deprived of them. Especially is this true because the vast majority of teachers in this city are women. It is a delicate situation for a man to be tried for any sort of crime or misdemeanor, and even a man is liable to become embarrassed; but to take a woman who has not been in the habit of public appearances before this committee, put her on trial, and not allow her to have either counsel or any of her friends present makes a very aggravated and unjustifiable condition of affairs. My own opinion about it is that all of these investigations in which the characters and conduct of teachers are on trial should be conducted——

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. MORRELL. I would state to the gentleman that the committee is disposed to accept the amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, I am very glad of that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I question the power of the Committee on the District of Columbia to accept an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not propose to confer that authority upon that committee, and was just putting the question to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I want to explain why I objected to the committee recurring to section 2 for the purpose of enabling the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] to offer this provision as an amendment to that section. I think there ought to be a vote in the House upon the amendment adopted by the committee two weeks ago to section 2, taking the power of appointing the school board away from the District Commissioners and vesting it in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and I do not want that section complicated too much.

Mr. BABCOCK. Well, Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman that there will be a separate vote demanded in the House on that proposition.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I am very glad to know it. I understand that only two members of the supreme court of the District of Columbia even pretend to have been residents of the District at the time they were appointed, and I understand, further, that the members of that court go back to the States where they claim residence, one to the State of Vermont and one to the State of Ohio and one to some other State, at every annual election to vote. Now, I think the committee made a grievous mistake in making that radical change, and I think it is the overwhelming sentiment of the people of the District of Columbia, those who are the most deeply interested in the administration of the schools, that the selection of the school board should remain in the District Commissioners, where it logically and properly belongs.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Is the gentleman in favor of my amendment or against it?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman's amendment ought not to be adopted.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Because it seems to imply a public trial upon the investigation of the fitness of a teacher to remain in the public schools. I do not believe that is good policy. I do not believe the gentleman is conferring any valuable privilege upon the teachers of the schools to make public investigations respecting their fitness unless they see fit to make them. I have no special interest in the matter at all.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What does the gentleman think of a proposition of trying an ordinary citizen for a felony without the privilege of counsel?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I would not consent to that for a moment.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No; because the gentleman is a lawyer; but what is the difference now as a matter of interest between being tried for a felony and being tried for something that will ruin your character as a teacher, the business that you are prepared for, for life?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Because sometimes there may be some personal quality lacking in a teacher which makes him unsuccessful in a particular place or in a particular line that may be investigated and decided without reflecting upon him in any way.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, he has a right to be informed of it, then.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And according to the gentleman's amendment the public will be informed of it, and he probably never could get employment in the profession of school-teaching afterwards.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon, but he evidently misapprehends what the amendment is. The amendment is that when a particular teacher is put on trial or under investigation, he or she shall have the privilege of having counsel before this board of education and also the privilege of being accompanied by at least one friend selected by the teacher. It is not a public trial.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Well, I never knew of an investigation where there were friends and counsel present that was not practically public.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, then, this ought to be public.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It would be infinitely better if the gentleman would make public trials and provide that the teacher under investigation should be represented by counsel than to make them neither public nor private.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have about half a minute on the gentleman's amendment. I am in favor of that part of the gentleman's amendment which provides that the teacher should be allowed to be present. I think that is all right. I once had the honor of serving as the chairman of the committee on grievance in a board of education, and there were two cases before our committee. In one of those cases the party accused was present, and in the other the party was represented by counsel. We got along very well with the first. We had no difficulty in dealing out even-handed justice. In the other, the attorney tried to make a hurrah case out of it in the newspapers, and of course it was exploited, and his remarks were exploited, and the whole thing was very detrimental to the public school and to the school-teachers, whom we held to be blameless in the matter. It was very detrimental because of the conduct of the pettifogger who appeared before us. It stirred up some elements in the city and in the schools, which proved of great detriment to the schools for a long time. Now, I should favor the first part of the gentleman's amendment—that the teacher or whoever it was might be present; but I do not think they should be represented by counsel.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I was starting to give what little I had to say about this when the gentleman from Pennsylvania offered to accept the amendment and the gentleman from Indiana objected to his accepting it. The situation about these investigations before the board of directors is this: As a general thing the witnesses for the prosecution fancy that they have some grievance somewhere. They are not to blame; they have a right to be heard. They go in and give their side of the story. Now, nearly any kind of a tale will sound all right and hang together until somebody attacks it by cross-examination, and then nine-tenths of them vanish into thin air; and notwithstanding all the talk about the waste of time of cross-examination there never has been any other method devised that is as good to ascertain the truth. The difficult art of cross-examination can be learned only by practice. For one of these female teachers or one of the male teachers—because they have had no experience of the kind—to undertake to cross-examine these witnesses, who are infuriated by what they think is some wrong to themselves or to their children, is almost preposterous. Of course occasionally you run across a school-teacher who can do that, but the vast majority of them have not been trained to do it, and as far as the pettifogging to which the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] refers is concerned, I suppose there are pettifoggers in Washington as well as elsewhere; but as a rule the teachers would employ reputable counsel to represent them and protect them, and I think it is equally necessary that these teachers be permitted to take at least one friend into these examinations to hold up their hands and give them countenance. It is in the interest of a fair deal. My amendment ought to be adopted, and I have no doubt that it will be adopted, for it is in harmony with our history and our court procedure.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, I call for a vote on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BURLESON. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman. I desire to know whether the words "six hundred" before the word "dollars," in line 4, were stricken out upon the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair advises the gentleman from Texas that they were not stricken out.

Mr. BURLESON. Then I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, has not that section been passed?

The CHAIRMAN. No; we are still on that section, or rather the committee has just adopted an independent section. If the gentleman raises the point of order, I suppose, strictly speaking, we have passed that section, although the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri was really in the nature of an amendment to the section.

Mr. PAYNE. We can only return by unanimous consent, and we have passed that section.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania raise that point of order?

Mr. MORRELL. I feel that the disposition of the committee is——

Mr. BURLESON. I will state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that but for the fact of being engaged at the time I would have offered the amendment. I was laboring under the impression it had been offered and adopted.

Mr. MORRELL. In view of that, Mr. Chairman, of course I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 11, line 4, strike out the words "six hundred."

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of that amendment is to reduce the salary of the assistant superintendents as proposed by this bill $600. As a matter of fact, if this bill should be adopted—I will ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania what are the salaries paid to assistant superintendents?

Mr. MORRELL. Two thousand five hundred dollars.

Mr. BURLESON. That is as I thought. As a matter of fact, if the amendment is adopted which I offer the assistant superintendents of the schools will then be granted an increase of salary of $500 per annum, and if the bill as reported by the committee is adopted and my amendment is voted down they will be granted an increase of $1,100 per annum. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the attention of the committee to this fact, and but for the reason that I had so many other amendments to offer I would have opposed this paragraph of the bill upon the ground that the public schools of Washington are given too much supervision. We have a treble system of supervision in this city in our public schools as provided for in this bill.

We have a superintendent and assistant superintendents engaged in supervising the schools. We have in addition what is termed "the supervising principal," who is engaged in supervising the particular schools over which he is given jurisdiction. Then we have in addition to these two classes of supervisors, the principal of the school, who, of course, supervises that particular school. I challenge the record upon the proposition that in the best devised public school system of this country, which I believe is claimed to be in Massachusetts, they have no such superabundance of supervision as is provided for in this bill.

Mr. Chairman, consider this for an instant. I will not be radical about this proposition, though I believe we ought to absolutely strike out of this bill all provision for this second class of school supervisors; but I do ask the members of this committee to vote up this amendment offered by me and strike out a part of the salary provided for in this bill for these assistant superintendents. Three thousand dollars for an assistant superintendent of schools is what I propose to give them under the terms of this bill, an increase of their present salary of $500 per annum. Can any gentleman here say that it is not a fair and a just increase of compensation? As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman—and I invite the gentlemen in charge of this bill to deny the proposition, if they can—this proposed increase of assistant superintendent's salary to $3,600 is out of all proportion to all other increases that are provided for in this bill. The salary ought to be cut down to $2,500, and except for my regard for the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORRELL] who has this matter in charge, I would make the motion to cut it down to $2,500, the amount they are now receiving and which I think is adequate compensation.

Mr. MORRELL. I will say to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON], concerning the system of the supervision of the public schools in the District of Columbia, that the supervision costs the District of Columbia less in proportion to the total amount appropriated for school purposes than it does some thirty-odd other cities in the Union—those of equal size and those of larger size. The actual cost of supervision in the District of Columbia amounts to the small percentage of 6½ per cent, which is not, I submit to the gentlemen of the committee, a large proportion of the amount of money appropriated.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. May I interrupt the gentleman for a question?

Mr. MORRELL. Certainly.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee whether or not, in his judgment, he does not think that an advance of $1,100 a year to a person filling a subordinate position is not a pretty steep sum?

Mr. MORRELL. If we are to proceed upon the principle that the House has adopted in regard to cutting down the items in connection with the other officers, I presume that it is but right to cut down this.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. We have already adopted that?

Mr. MORRELL. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Would it not be better, then, to act in harmony with that action?

Mr. MORRELL. I was just simply trying to explain to the committee that perhaps it has been misled in regard to the expense of the supervision of the schools in the District, and I maintain again that 6½ per cent of the total amount appropriated to be spent for supervision is not a very expensive system of supervising the number of schools—the dual system that exists to-day in the District of Columbia.

The supervision of the District of Columbia schools is in the hands of the superintendent, two assistant superintendents, the supervising principals, two directors of high schools, one of whom has direction of all the manual training in the high and grade schools, and the directors of special instruction.

One assistant superintendent supplements and extends the work of the superintendent in the white schools by acting as his representative in any capacity assigned by him, the other assistant superintendent doing the same work in the colored schools. The work of the assistant superintendents is distinct from that of the supervising principals in that the supervision of the latter gathers local features and tendencies for the use of the superintendent, while the former, the assistant superintendents, exercise a general supervision of the various parts of the system in maintaining a legitimate unification of work. In addition, the assistant superintendents have many special duties assigned them by the superintendent. This plan, carrying with it the office of assistant superintendents, conforms to that employed by all the business organizations, since these require a deputy or deputies to act upon all occasions in place of the superintendent or head.

The supervising principals are in reality district superintendents, who meet with the superintendent weekly and who carry out his policy. They are responsible for the educational development in their division schools and are in constant and close touch with the teachers who are intrusted with this development. The duties of the supervising principals and of principals of buildings, while supplementing, do not in any sense overlap each other. The principals of buildings, in addition to being teachers of eighth-grade classes, have charge of the administration of their buildings, their discipline and health, their records and reports, their morale in the neighborhood, and the like. The public school system of the District of Columbia could not be administered properly without its supervising principals, by whatever name called, and its principals of buildings, by whatever name called.

The directors of special instruction are responsible for the drawing, the music, the physical culture, the cooking, the sewing, and the carpentry in the public school service. (See Table A.) To these directors belong much of the credit for the high standard which our schools have attained in their special subjects. Our pupils are, under these heads, given much practical instruction, which becomes of inestimable value to them as the future citizens.

This plan of supervision, in successful operation in the public schools of the District of Columbia since 1870, has been more recently adopted by Baltimore, Philadelphia, Chicago, and other cities of prominence.

The cost of supervision in the District of Columbia is the lowest in a list of thirty-two of the largest cities in the United States. (See Table B.)

With all the supervision in the District of Columbia schools, the entire cost of their supervision is only 6.5 per cent of the cost of their maintenance. (See Table C.)

TABLE A.—Number of teachers in special subjects.

The apparently excessive number of teachers of special subjects in Washington is accounted for by these facts:

1. Every girl in the public schools from the third to the sixth grades, inclusive, is taught to sew. There are 12,000 such pupils. This requires teachers of sewing.

2. Every girl in the schools of the seventh and eighth grades is taught to cook. There are 4,500 such pupils. This requires teachers of cooking.

3. Every boy in grades 7 and 8 is taught manual training. There are 3,300 such pupils. This requires teachers of manual training.

4. Every pupil from the first to the eighth grade, inclusive, is taught drawing, music, and physical culture. In this work the grade teacher is, of course, the real teacher in giving said instruction, though the initial lessons in each subject are in some cases given by the special teacher.

In regard to the development of the manual-training idea the Appropriations Committees of the House and Senate have been fully aware, and have always made liberal provision for same.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON].

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HINSHAW. I move, in line 5, page 11, to strike out the words "six hundred."

Mr. BURLESON. I would say to the gentleman the entire line has gone out.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HINSHAW] withdraws the amendment. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That the pay of officers shall be as follows: The superintendent, $5,000; the assistant superintendents, $3,600; the superintendent of buildings and supplies, $3,600; supervisors of high schools, supervisors of manual training schools, and supervising principals, $2,200 per annum, with an increase of $100 per year for ten years.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I move to insert, after the word "superintendents," on line 4, page 11, the words "and principals of normal schools."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. McCLEARY].

Mr. MORRELL. I might suggest to the gentleman——

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order on that.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, I trust the gentleman will reserve it for a moment until I can explain.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order.

Mr. MORRELL. While I have an opportunity I will explain to the gentleman, the normal school principals have already been provided for on page 10, line 3.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. I understand that. That is precisely where I think the mistake was made.

Mr. PAYNE. Does the gentleman desire to give them two salaries now?

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. I will amend to strike that out.

Mr. PAYNE. You can not go back to that now.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. I will ask consent to do it. I shall ask opportunity to present my case, and then it is for the committee to determine whether it is wise or unwise.

Mr. HINSHAW. Provision as in the bill gives these superintendents of normal schools $2,000 a year, and your amendment gives them $3,000?

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. Yes, sir. The purpose of the amendment is this, namely, to place the superintendents of normal schools or principals of normal schools, whatever they are called, on a salary of $3,000 a year. Now, Mr. Chairman, the point is this, that the superintendent or principal or president, or whatever you call him, of the normal school ought to have $3,000 a year. We pay $3,000 a year to the presidents of the normal schools in my State, they do it in Wisconsin, and they do it all through the Northwest. The normal schools are the schools where teachers are fitted for their work. It is the most important school in the city, and the man at the head ought to have $3,000 a year. That is the case; so make your point of order, if you want to.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, the committee has already passed upon the question that the gentleman from Minnesota is raising now.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman insist on his point of order?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I insist on the point of order. It is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF THE BOARD OF EDUCATION.

SEC. 10. That the salaries of the employees of the office of the secretary of the board of education shall be: Secretary, $2,000; statistician, $1,400; clerk, $1,200; stenographer, $900; messenger, $720.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORRELL] offers an amendment.

Mr. MORRELL. It is to strike out the entire section; and I make that amendment for the reason that that is already provided for in the appropriation bill which has passed the House, and therefore is unnecessary in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORRELL] moves to amend by striking out the entire section.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. That the clerk, assistant to the superintendent of buildings and supplies, shall have a salary of $1,200 per annum; the salary of the inspector of janitors shall be $1,200 per annum, and the salary of the stenographer and typewriter shall be $900 per annum.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, I make the same motion in regard to section 11.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out section 11.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 12. That there shall be appointed by the board of education upon the recommendation of the superintendent of schools two school nurses, who shall be graduates of a recognized training school for nurses, one white and one colored, at a salary of $900 per annum each, one of whom shall be assigned to the white schools and one to the colored schools, whose qualifications for appointment and whose duties shall be designated by the board of education.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section just read. It provides for the appointment of two trained nurses. There are already provided for the schools of the District of Columbia twelve medical inspectors, twelve physicians, who visit the schools, examine the pupils, record any case of sickness, and do everything that is necessary to prevent the breaking out of epidemics in the schools. These twelve medical inspectors were first authorized in 1904. Since that time, according to the statement of the superintendent of schools, there have been no epidemics in the schools. When it is considered that there are in the District of Columbia, if I recollect correctly, about 150 school buildings, that the children attending the schools are scattered over an immense territory, the members of the committee will realize how absolutely impracticable it would be for two trained nurses to render any effective service at all to the school system. Evidently the committee itself was not very much impressed with the necessity for these nurses, because this bill imposes upon the board of education the duty of outlining the duties to be performed by these nurses. Under all the circumstances, I submit, that there is hardly any excuse for the authorization and appointment of two nurses for the schools of the District.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, I ought to say that the committee considered the matter of the appointment of trained nurses, and a good deal of testimony was submitted to it showing that it tended to prevent the introduction of disease among the children, and it thereby resulted in a great deal of success in the city of New York.

On pages 34 and 35 of the report of the committee on H. R. 3395 you will read that the medical inspection, which has been in active operation since September, 1903, has been a great help to the schools as well as a protection to each child who attends the public schools in the District of Columbia. It is seldom that a new work of such magnitude, especially where so many and varied interests are to be subserved, is begun so harmoniously and with such good results. During the first year 10,262 children have been temporarily excluded from the public schools, 599 of whom were excluded on account of the child either having been exposed or actually infected with some contagious disease which would have endangered the health of the other scholars.

Visiting nurses in the public schools of New York City have proven to be of great assistance to the medical inspectors and have rendered efficient service to the community by seeing that a pupil who has been temporarily excluded from the schools by a medical inspector receives prompt and proper care, thus aiding materially the time in which the children are kept from school. It was also found that a number of parents were indifferent to the physical condition of their children unless actually sick in bed, and were not willing to prevent the spread of any minor contagious disease from which their children were afflicted. In these cases the visiting nurses would render efficient and valuable service.

By this simple method the children of the community lose the least amount of schooling, the medical inspector's work is made to produce the best results, and the community is protected from contagious diseases, not only by their detection, but by their isolation, with immediate and proper treatment.

As will be seen in page 405 of the hearings, this subject was thoroughly gone into by the subcommittee.

The member of the District Committee [Mr. OLCOTT] submitted a great many very powerful reasons why we should have this system in vogue here. I would be very glad if he would give the committee the benefit of his knowledge.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I hope the motion to strike out the provision for nurses, of my colleague from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] will not prevail. I know that the appointment of trained nurses in New York City has been of great value. I appreciate perfectly that there are medical inspectors, but in these days of telephones it is an admirable thing to have nurses constantly within reach. In cases where disease breaks out among the children a trained nurse can be called for at the particular school where such trouble may happen. I think it will be found by the experience in the District of Columbia there will be ample work to be done by the two nurses, one for the colored schools and one for the white schools, and it will be an economy in the long run.

Mr. GOULDEN. Does my colleague from New York [Mr. OLCOTT] mean to tell the House, or rather the committee, that this is simply an experiment for the white and colored schools by providing for two nurses only?

Mr. OLCOTT. I do not think it is an experiment except in the District of Columbia. We have not had it here up to this time.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman allow me, as an old school official of the city of New York, to say that they are actually needed in the physical well-being of the children and do a great deal of good; but two is entirely inadequate. As my friend from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] says, it ought to be ten instead of two to do the work. They do work that the medical inspectors can not do; in fact, are not expected to do. They go to the families where it is claimed there are diseases of serious or a contagious character, and do splendid work. It has been found very satisfactory wherever tried. The principals of nearly all the schools in New York ask for the benefit and use of these nurses. They have given satisfaction, and the demand for them is growing. My colleague [Mr. OLCOTT] is right in his contention, but the number provided for in the bill is entirely inadequate.

Mr. OLCOTT. I only wish to say to the gentleman that I did not mean to say that it was experimental except in the city of Washington.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] will prevail, and that this provision will be stricken from the bill. The conditions are not all analogous between the city of Washington and the city of New York, with its congested population, with its people coming in large numbers from every quarter of the globe, with its infectious diseases brought from everywhere.

And again, sir, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOULDEN] intimated, it is simply an entering wedge. Only two this year, five next year, ten the year following, and so on, until every school will have a trained nurse. I think the physicians already employed and paid out of the public Treasury will give a careful supervision of the schools, sufficient to prevent the serious spread of contagious diseases, and it does not seem to me that we are called upon at this present time to add this additional expense.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I should like just a few moments. In the city of New York there is expended on the public schools in the neighborhood of $25,000,000 a year. This enormous expenditure is due to a considerable extent to the introduction of a lot of useless and unnecessary fads in the schools. The schools in the District of Columbia cover an immense extent of territory. The schools are scattered; the school population is scattered. There are twelve doctors now, and if there be need for any more the number ought to be increased. If two nurses be appointed, whatever particular duties might be assigned to them, the two would be absolutely unable to perform any duties that would be of any special benefit. I hope that this motion will prevail, and that this beginning of a system of nurses will have its ending right here, and that the section will go out.

Mr. MORRELL. I call for a vote.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 13. That a commission, consisting of the superintendent of schools, the superintendent of buildings and supplies, and the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department, is hereby created for the purpose of submitting to Congress at its session beginning December, 1906—

First. A general plan for the consolidation of the public schools in the District of Columbia, and the abandonment and sale of such school buildings and sites as may by them be deemed necessary and desirable for the best good of the public school service.

Second. A general plan for the character, size, and location of school buildings in accordance with which the educational and business interests of the public school system may be subserved.

Mr. MORRELL. I desire to offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 12, line 13, strike out the words "superintendent of buildings and supplies" and insert the words "Engineer Commissioner."

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRELL. A parliamentary inquiry. Can I offer an amendment at this time, or motion to strike out section 14?

The CHAIRMAN. That has not been read yet. After it is read the gentleman will be in order to move to strike it out.

Mr. MORRELL. I ask unanimous consent that section 14 be stricken out of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to make the motion. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken on striking out section 14; and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, I move that the sections may be renumbered, so that they will be consecutive.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRELL. I move, Mr. Chairman, that the bill with amendments be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

TEMPORARY MAINTENANCE OF LONG BRIDGE OVER THE POTOMAC RIVER.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I now ask for consideration of the bill (H. R. 14897) providing for the temporary maintenance of the Long Bridge over the Potomac River, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the bill at length.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, I raise a point of order on section 3.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can raise the point of order when the bill is read by sections.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be now read by sections.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the bill be read under the five-minute rule for amendment.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I be allowed to raise the point of order now, because if the Chair thinks it will lie I take it that there will be no debate on the bill at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent that he be allowed to raise the point of order as to section 3 at this time. Is there objection?

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I object until I can make a statement.

Mr. MUDD. Well, I will reserve the point of order in order to allow the gentleman from Wisconsin to make a statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to make a statement pending the request of the gentleman from Maryland for unanimous consent to make the point of order at this time.

Mr. BABCOCK. Now, Mr. Chairman, this bill is brought to this House for the reason that the new bridge across the Potomac River that has just been completed is not yet in shape to stand heavy traffic. The bridge itself is 2,600 feet long. The approaches on this side of the river are 2,200 feet long.

Mr. WANGER. Is the gentleman referring to the new highway bridge?

Mr. BABCOCK. The new highway bridge across the Potomac River to take the place of the old Long Bridge. The approaches, built of earth, on this side of the bridge are 2,200 feet long; the approaches on the Virginia side are 1,200 feet long; making in approaches 3,600 feet, and in iron construction 2,600 feet. The gentlemen that are most interested, living in Virginia—that is, the brick interests—as well as the War Department and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia—have come before the committee, asking that Congress maintain the Long Bridge until they had time to properly prepare the approaches of the new bridge for heavy traffic. That must be done with granite blocks, as nothing will be strong enough to stand the traffic except granite blocks.

After a thorough examination and a report of this bill to this House and a rereference to the committee for further hearings, we find that gentlemen representing the brick interests in Virginia, or the greater part of them, concede all the committee suggests, and that is this: We find that some of the heaviest vehicles hauled over the roads and the asphalt pavements in the city are loaded with brick. One man states his concern hauls 50,000,000 brick here during a year. Wagons in general use have a 2-inch tire, and whenever that great load of brick, which weighs more than 3 tons, strikes a little abrasion or crack in the street it makes a larger one, and as you have all had an object lesson during the last two months with the holes on Pennsylvania avenue and Fifteenth street, where these loads go, that it has kept a large crew of men busy keeping the streets in repair.

Now, upon the new bridge the District receives from the street railway company crossing it a revenue of one-half a cent a passenger, or about $8,000 a year, for the use of the bridge. The Pennsylvania Railroad Company had a contract for the use and maintenance of the Long Bridge, which expired when they took possession of the new bridge erected by them solely for railway purposes, and when the District of Columbia government took possession of the new highway bridge. But the brick men, the War Department, and the Commissioners say that the approaches to the new bridge will not stand the traffic until there is a granite pavement there; that in two weeks the heavy traffic would tear them all to pieces, and they want Congress to provide for maintaining Long Bridge until next December, when the earth will have settled sufficiently to permit work of permanently paving the highway bridge approaches. Now, your committee provides in this bill $5,000 to pay the expenses of the operation of Long Bridge until next December.

I want to say here that the Pennsylvania Railroad Company is operating and keeping the Long Bridge open at my personal request pending the passage of this legislation.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman says, Mr. Chairman, as the law is, as I understand him, that the people who haul brick have to pay so much to go over the bridge?

Mr. BABCOCK. No; the bridges are all free.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman said something about half a cent.

Mr. BABCOCK. That is for the railroad that runs to Mount Vernon. That railroad company pays a half cent a passenger to the District for every passenger that crosses the bridge in its cars, which yields a revenue of about $8,000 per year. The contract with the Pennsylvania Railroad Company was completed when they vacated Long Bridge, but under the law they were obliged to take out Long Bridge, and they will be obliged under this bill to demolish it later. It has been a menace to navigation. It is not so now to navigation, but when there is ice in the river it causes floods and dams up the river, and many times the Appropriation Committee has had to appropriate from five to ten thousand dollars to break up the ice so that it could get through these low spans of the bridge and clear the channel.

Mr. WANGER. Whose duty is it to remove Long Bridge?

Mr. BABCOCK. The duty of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company.

Mr. WANGER. Will that duty continue?

Mr. BABCOCK. That duty continues. Now, the proposition contained in this bill is this: To provide sufficient money to pay for the operation of the Long Bridge until December; but incidentally the question of narrow tires in the District was brought up, and I requested that the mounted force, or rather the bicycle force, of the police department of the District of Columbia investigate the different streets and report to the committee why it was that the streets were constantly torn to pieces and these holes were being dug in them, causing the employment of a force of men practically all the time to keep them in repair. Those men reported that it was caused by the heavy loads and narrow tires, which destroyed the pavements. The first little hole you could hardly see, but that is the starting point. It is like a little dent on the railroad track, where the locomotive runs over it, and it gets deeper and deeper every time it passes over. The Committee on Appropriations is furnishing thousands and thousands of dollars a year to keep up these beautiful asphalt streets, and we are permitting loads of 6 and 8 and 10 and 12 tons to run over these streets with 2 and 2½ inch tires, tearing them all to pieces. The committee comes in with a proposition that on all loads exceeding 4,500 pounds in weight the wagons must be provided with tires of not less than 4 inches in width. At first the question was brought up, and the suggestion was made that this would interfere with country traffic; that the farmers could not come and bring their cabbages and tomatoes and melons and all those nice things that come from Maryland and Virginia. I asked for a detail of the police force to investigate it, and stated that I had never, in my experience of a year that I had given to this subject, seen a heavy load with less than a 4-inch wagon tire. Members have seen these great loads of hay here, weighing 3 and 4 and 5 tons, with four and six horses. Now, not one of those wagons have less than 4-inch tires. Out here in Maryland they reduce the taxation on wagons as they increased the width of the tire for the benefit of the roads. The committee had a report from a sergeant of police concerning an examination made by him of forty-six loads of hay that came into the District weighing beyond this limit. Forty-five wagons had tires 4 inches in width, and one load had tires 3 inches in width. It was proven to the satisfaction of the committee that it did not affect the agricultural interests; it did not affect the farmer who brought his produce here into the city of Washington, and if you will stop to think for a moment, you can see how that is true.

You never saw a load of 4,500 pounds of cabbages, or anything of that kind. The usual truck load that comes in here weighs 500 or 600 or maybe 1,000 or, perhaps, even 2,000 pounds, and it comes right down to the question of the draymen and the transportation companies in the city of Washington and the people who haul brick. They are the ones who do the damage. Why, we were perfectly astonished to find that these companies here in the city of Washington came before the committee and opposed this proposition, and that they wanted to use 2½-inch tires, which was the standard, and we found out that on those 2½-inch tires they put a load sometimes of 12 and 15 tons, enough for a carload, with steel rails to run on, and then they expect Congress to appropriate the money to keep up an asphalt street to support such loads as that. The committee, in this bill, extends the time for Long Bridge, in order to accommodate our Virginia friends. We charge them no toll. The government of the District pays for the temporary maintenance of the bridge, but we do say to them: "Gentlemen, when you want to haul these heavy loads over our fine streets you must provide an adequate tire, which will not tear the streets all to pieces." This regulation is reasonable and proper, and it affects principally two transportation companies in the city of Washington. They come along with a great story of how much it is going to cost to provide 4-inch tires. To comply with this regulation does not require a new wheel or a new wagon, and it will not go into effect until the 1st of next January. All they have to do is to put on a new tire, and in some cases a new felly, because they are liable to split it in taking it off. It is a very small matter.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And a tire will wear out in about eighteen or twenty months.

Mr. BABCOCK. And the testimony before the committee—I am glad the gentleman referred to it—was that the life of a tire was from twelve months to two years, owing to its use.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And those with brakes will wear out before that.

Mr. BABCOCK. And those with brakes will wear out before that. Now, the simple question of this bill is, gentlemen, will you protect the streets; will you ask men hauling heavy loads, loads that weigh more than 4,500 pounds, because it does not affect the load weighing that amount or less, to aid in protecting the streets of Washington, and make it possible for us to have what we are all seeking to do, the finest streets in the world? That is all section 3 seeks to accomplish. [Applause.]

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the Chair passing on the point of order, providing it does not waive all rights——

Mr. MUDD. If I may be allowed, my reason for asking what I do at this point is this: I apprehend there is no objection to this bill as to any other section except section 3. Now, if the Chair should take it into his mind to rule this section out on my point of order, why the rest of the bill would go on smoothly with no opposition at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent that he may be allowed at this time to raise the point of order that he proposes to make against section 3. Is there objection?

Mr. MUDD. That is the broad-tire section.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Reserving the right to object, I would like to have the section read.

Mr. MUDD. It is the wide-tire section.

Mr. RIXEY. I understand, Mr. Chairman, that this will not interfere with general debate.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right to object. I really do not know what it is.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state, in answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from Virginia, that a ruling on the point of order either way would have no effect either upon general debate or the reading of the bill under the five-minute rule. All rights will be preserved.

Mr. RIXEY. I want to be heard in general debate.

Mr. MUDD. My point of order is this, that section 3 is not germane to the remainder of the bill.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is that the broad-tire part?

Mr. MUDD. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to be allowed to make at this time a point of order against section 3. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. Now, the gentleman from Maryland makes the point of order that section 3 is not germane to the balance of the bill. Does the gentleman desire to be heard upon it?

Mr. MUDD. Yes; briefly. The bill, Mr. Chairman, by its title shows that it is a measure providing for the temporary maintenance of Long Bridge, over the Potomac River, and for other purposes. A reading of the bill will show that the main purpose of the bill, in consonance with its title, is to provide for a temporary maintenance of the bridge and providing that the railroad company shall have a little longer time for removing the bridge and for various matters relating to its maintenance in the meantime. There is nothing in the title——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has examined the bill.

Mr. MUDD (continuing). Even indicating that there is anything relating to streets. The report upon the bill states that the purpose of the proposed legislation is to provide for the temporary maintenance of the Long Bridge, across the Potomac River, until December 15, 1906. That is the avowed and only purpose of the bill. Now, section 3 provides as follows:

> That from and after the 1st day of January, 1907, every wagon or other vehicle of whatsoever kind or description weighing, when loaded, more than 4,500 pounds, used, operated, or propelled on, over, or across any of the streets, avenues, alleys, bridges, or roadways of the District of Columbia, shall have wheel tires not less than 4 inches broad.

Then there is a penal clause. Now, Mr. Chairman, under the bill, which shows in its title and in the report that its only purpose is to provide for the temporary maintenance of Long Bridge, over in the southwest portion of the city, leading from this city to Virginia, here is a provision under which you might regulate wagons running from Good Hope Hill over there across the Eastern Branch or over any or all the streets and avenues of the city.

If this third section had provided only for the regulation of the tires of wagons coming over that bridge, why I take it for granted it might be in order, but it regulates the tires of all wagons which are not referred to in the title whatever, over all the streets not only in the city, but in the District, and it has a penal section also, all of which I think are entirely out of any semblance of germaneness to the primary and principal purposes and objects of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that one of the ways to preserve a bridge is to make wagons that go over it use broad tires. I have driven wagons over bridges and on roads, and I have helped to build bridges. I have observed that roads and bridges are cut up by narrow tires to an extent my friend from Maryland [Mr. MUDD] does not know anything about. A broad tire does not wear a dirt road, street, or bridge as much as a narrow tire. The broad tire is one of the things, I believe, that many sections of the country have adopted to save the highways.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion, first, that this bill went to the Committee on the District of Columbia substantially as it now stands, and is reported from the District Committee in that manner, and the committee has no direct control over the bill in respect to its form on a question of order. The Chair is further of the opinion that the principle of germaneness relates to a proposition by which it is proposed to modify some pending original proposition, and the Chair is of the opinion, whether it is cognate to the principal subject-matter of the bill or otherwise, that this section is a part of the original proposition, in effect is the original proposition, now pending before the committee, and therefore the point of germaneness does not lie to the section. And the Chair is advised that this opinion is in accordance with the universal construction of rules of the House, and therefore does not sustain the point of order.

Mr. RIXEY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY] is recognized.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard in general debate on this bill. This third section of the bill will be new law if enacted, and it concerns not only the people in Maryland and in Virginia, but it concerns very large interests in the city of Washington and in the District of Columbia. It certainly seems to me that a provision of this kind, which concerns the business interests of this city and District, should at least have been referred by the District Committee to the District Commissioners for a recommendation. But the unusual course has been pursued in this case of not referring this proposed provision to the District Commissioners. The business interests of the city of Washington held a called meeting at which many of the representative business men were present. They insisted this provision would work great hardship upon them and they requested a hearing and that the matter might be referred to the District Commissioners.

The District Committee did have the bill recommitted and did give one hearing to the business interests here, and a partial hearing to the people of Virginia. But, as I am advised, they never referred this third section of the bill to the District Commissioners, and I am further advised, and I believe the statement is true, that the District Commissioners are opposed to the third section of the bill. It may be that that is the reason it was not referred to them. One of the newspapers in this city, in referring to the matter——

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Is the gentleman authorized to make that statement by the Commissioners, I will ask?

Mr. RIXEY. The statement had been made in the public papers that the District Commissioners were opposed to it.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I asked the gentleman if he knows that.

Mr. RIXEY. I can not speak for the District Commissioners, but I state this as a fact, that it is the custom here, when bills are introduced affecting the business interests of the city of Washingon to refer the bills to the District Commissioners for a recommendation, and that course was not pursued in this case. The first part of this bill is the outgrowth of a bill introduced by myself in regard to the old Long Bridge. Two bills were introduced—one at the instance of the War Department—asking that the time for the completion of the new highway bridge might be extended for some time to enable the approaches to be completed. If the time for the completion of that bridge was to be extended, then it followed, as a matter of necessity, that the time for the demolition of the old Long Bridge had to be extended, because there would be no other way of crossing the river from that part of Virginia into the city. So I introduced a bill providing that the old Long Bridge should be continued in existence for the length of time that the completion of the new highway bridge should be extended. These bills went to the committee, and the committee referred them to the District Commissioners for recommendation. They recommended them both. They were also referred to the War Department, and the War Department recommended the passage of both of these bills. Subsequently Congress passed the resolution extending the time for the completion of the new highway bridge.

Thereupon the chairman of the District Committee, as he states, made an arrangement with the Pennsylvania road by which the old Long Bridge should continue to be operated, on an assurance on his part that Congress would provide compensation to the railroad for the expenses of maintaining and operating the draw to the old Long Bridge. So far as the bill carries out that understanding, Mr. Chairman, I think the bill ought to pass. I have no disposition to embarrass the gentleman from Wisconsin from making good his assurance to the railroad.

The first and second sections of this bill have been recommended by the District Commissioners, and I believe that they ought to be enacted into law. But the third section is the one to which I object; is the one which has not gone through the regular channels; is the one which is not recommended by the District Commissioners; is the one which is opposed, I believe, by the unanimous voice of the business people of this city, as I think I can show.

After this wide-tire provision was reported I wrote to the mayors of Richmond, Norfolk, Baltimore, and Philadelphia, asking what width of tire was required for wagons in their respective cities. I selected these cities because they were nearest to Washington.

The mayor of the city of Richmond replied as follows:

Three or four horse wagons or trucks must have tires not less than 2½ inches; wagons or trucks carrying a load exceeding 6,000 pounds shall have tires not less than 2½ inches.

Again:

In addition to the requirements above stated, we have a provision intended to encourage the use of wide tires, which provides that a wagon drawn by four horses shall pay a license tax of $20 unless the body of the vehicle be on elliptic springs or on wheels with tires not less than 4 inches wide, in which case the license tax is reduced to $17.50.

So in the city of Richmond the regulation width of tires carrying a load of 6,000 pounds is 2½ inches.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Did the mayor of Richmond tell you anything about how a 2½-inch tire down there wears the street out?

Mr. RIXEY. I suppose it wears like any tire of that width. I suppose my friend knows something about that.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Did he say anything about 4 inches wearing less?

Mr. RIXEY. Maybe one of 10 inches would wear less.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It would.

Mr. RIXEY. Why do you not support that proposition?

The following is the reply from Norfolk:

OFFICE OF THE CITY TREASURER,
Norfolk, Va., March 7, 1906.

Hon. JOHN F. RIXEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your letter of March 3, addressed to the mayor of this city and forwarded to me, I beg to say that one of the clauses in our charter reads as follows:

"Eleventh. To regulate and prescribe the breadth of tires upon the wheels of wagons, carts, and vehicles of heavy draft used upon the streets of said city: Provided, however, That this section shall not apply to vehicles coming into and not owned in said city."

The city, however, has no ordinance regulating this matter.

Yours, very truly,

T. E. STEED.

Baltimore city reported as follows:

MAYOR'S OFFICE,
Baltimore, Md., March 5, 1906.

JOHN F. RIXEY, Esq.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Replying to yours of the 3d instant, addressed to his honor the mayor, I beg to advise that the city of Baltimore has authority from the State legislature to regulate the width of tires on wagons, but from information received I find that no ordinance covering this subject has ever been passed.

The nearest approach to regulation in this respect is covered by our wagon licenses, for which charges are made according to the number of horses used.

Yours, very truly,

H. W. NICE,
Mayor's Secretary.

And the reply from Philadelphia was as follows:

OFFICE OF THE MAYOR
Philadelphia, March 7, 1906.

Hon. JOHN F. RIXEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I have your letter of the 3d, and in reply thereto would say that we have no ordinance here or regulation in regard to width of tires on wagons; we have never believed it necessary.

Yours, very truly,

JOHN WEAVER, Mayor.

Now, here are letters from four cities which are the nearest to Washington, and not in a single one of them is there any regulation in regard to the width of tires, such as is proposed for Washington.

If this innovation was contemplated for the city of Washington, why was it not referred to the District Commissioners for a recommendation and for their views?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman tell the committee what sort of streets they have in Richmond?

Mr. RIXEY. They have pretty good streets in that city. Baltimore has many asphalt streets, and so has Philadelphia; I do not know how many. But I will say to the gentleman right here, and it will save the trouble of saying it at another time, if the pavements in the city of Washington will not bear the traffic that the streets of other cities bear, then some other system ought to be adopted.

Mr. WANGER. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. RIXEY. I will.

Mr. WANGER. In the State of Pennsylvania there is a law, a State law, providing for an abatement of taxes to the owners of vehicles that have broad tires.

Mr. RIXEY. Well, I expect that is true, and I would not object to a provision of that sort here.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as I said before, I do not believe the District Committee in this case represent the wishes of the business community.

Mr. BABCOCK. Will the gentleman permit a suggestion?

Mr. RIXEY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BABCOCK. I want to call the attention of the House to the fact, in reference to the letters read by the gentleman, that they come from cities that are not provided with asphalt streets over their entire surface. The fact is that in Chicago and Baltimore and the other cities where the heavy traffic passes over them the pavements are of granite blocks. In Chicago they do not permit wagons to travel over the asphalt streets.

Mr. RIXEY. I do not yield to the gentleman for a speech. The gentleman would not permit me to interrupt him.

Mr. BABCOCK. I will retire.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, I have here the following account of a protest by the business people of Washington City against this provision. The account is taken from the Evening Star of March 9, 1906:

FOR 4-INCH TIRES—WIDTH PRESCRIBED IN BILL BEFORE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—BUSINESS MEN PROTEST—MEETING HELD AT BOARD OF TRADE ROOMS YESTERDAY AFTERNOON—MATTER UNDER DISCUSSION—APPEAL FORMULATED FOR PRESENTATION TO CONGRESS—COMMITTEE APPOINTED TO HAVE CHARGE.

A proposition embodied in a bill now before Congress requiring all vehicles in the District of Columbia weighing with their loads over 2 tons to have 4-inch tires has caused widespread opposition among business men who would be affected by such a law.

This bill is said to have resulted from a desire to protect the paving of the approach to the new Highway Bridge. The managers of brickyards in Virginia, whose product is hauled to this city, desired to have the old Long Bridge kept open for use another year, so that their business might not be interfered with.

The bill originated at the War Department, and its purpose is said to be to require the brickmakers in Virginia to equip their wagons with wide tires to protect the approach to the long new Highway Bridge, which is not yet firmly settled. But as it is embodied in the bill it applies to the entire city.

A call was sent out by business men for a meeting in the board of trade rooms yesterday afternoon at 4 o'clock, at which there were in attendance about sixty men prominently engaged in business here employing teams. Among those present at the meeting were the following: P. J. Brennan, of the Brennan Construction Company; Archibald Greenlees, J. M. Burrell, V. B. Johnson, H. P. Johnson, Frank Hume, John L. Newbold, E. S. Alvord, W. S. Knox, A. C. Moses, A. Carey, W. H. Baum, F. R. Riley, G. W. Cissel; G. W. Barnes, of Potomac Brick Company; Mr. Pimm, of Warren Brothers; S. D. Lincoln, W. J. Zeh, W. S. Hoge, F. P. May, L. E. Smoot, Chas. Jacobsen; Mr. Green, of Corby Brothers; A. B. Willis; R. F. Mentzel, of Pabst Brewing Company.

OFFICERS CHOSEN.

Mr. Archibald Greenlees was made chairman of the meeting, and Mr. Perry Johnson was selected as secretary. Mr. John L. Newbold was called upon to explain the purpose of the meetings, and told of the bill that provides for 4-inch tires which has been favorably acted upon by the House Committee on the District of Columbia, and according to the present plans of the committee will come before the House next Monday to be put upon its passage. He said such a law would practically require the changing of the wheels of all the two-horse teams in this city as well as many one-horse teams. Such a change would involve an expense of a million or more dollars, he said.

Mr. P. J. Brennan, president of the Brennan Construction Company, which has laid a large portion of the asphalt pavements in this city, stated that his company lays these pavements under contract, which makes them liable for the good condition of the pavements for five years, and they have to give bond that they will correct any defect in the pavements occurring in that time. But he would prefer having tires of diversified sizes rather than tires of 4 inches. He did not consider that a 2-inch tire would be any more harmful than a 4-inch tire. What the pavements really suffer from, he said, is the lack of travel. An asphalt pavement that is not sufficiently traveled, he said, will be in worse condition than one that is greatly traveled by teams carrying tires of different widths.

After further discussion, Mr. Arthur C. Moses moved the appointment of a committee of seven to present this matter to the Members of the House in order that the bill may be recommitted to the committee and sent to the Commissioners for a report in view of the evidence that could be offered to them. The following committee was appointed: Messrs. John L. Newbold, P. J. Brennan, A. C. Moses, W. S. Knox, E. S. Alvord, Perry Johnson, and J. M. Burrell. This committee will proceed to carry out its instructions at once.

APPEAL TO CONGRESS.

A paper was prepared and addressed to Chairman J. W. BABCOCK, of the House District Committee, which, after it had been agreed to, was placed in the hands of the committee for presentation. It is as follows:

"We appeal to you and to your committee that H. R. bill 14897 be recommitted to the District Committee with a view to striking out section 3. We are informed that the subject has not been referred to our District Commissioners, and that unofficially they are opposed to its provisions.

"We respectfully ask for a hearing before your committee before this bill is again reported to the House; for, should it become a law its enforcement will cause the greatest hardships.

"By expert testimony that we herewith briefly submit, in advance of the hearing asked for, we show that the enforcement of this measure will be more damaging to the asphalt streets of the city than beneficial. The paving companies now give a guaranty, which is made good by large deposits of money in the hands of the District Commissioners, to make good all defects in the concrete paving for a term of five years, and these companies further beg to state herewith the enforcement of this measure will necessitate their making bids that will cost the District a greater expenditure, in view of the law which compels them to guarantee the work for five years.

STANDARD WIDTH IN UNITED STATES.

"We are credibly informed that the standard width of tire for all two-horse vehicles throughout the United States is 2½ inches, and if the result of using such a tire is satisfactory to all commercial cities in the United States, where the percentage of hauling is far greater than in this community, then it seems to us conclusive evidence that there is no need for putting this hardship upon the citizens of Washington, when no benefit of any sort can be obtained.

"We beg to state that one of our committee manufactured a wagon with a carrying capacity of two tons, and put thereon a four-inch tire, and it required four horses to handle the wagon instead of two, and it became necessary to rebuild the wagon.

"We also beg to state that this matter has not been in any way referred to the business interests of Washington. The undersigned committee of seven men, appointed at a meeting of the board of trade, themselves own 793 wagons and 970 horses, and 75 per cent of the business interests of Washington were present at this meeting, held at 4 p. m., March 8, at the board of trade rooms, and voted solidly against this measure. We estimate that the enforcement of this measure will entail an outlay of over $2,000,000 without any benefit whatsoever to the people, but will be actual great damage to the streets.

OF FAR-REACHING EFFECT.

"This little and apparently inoffensive rider is far-reaching in evil results, and will completely stop the bringing of farm produce, hay, corn, etc., into the city markets. The poor and the rich are vitally interested. New wheels and tires of the requisite weight added to every horse wagon in the District would make a weight scarcely any one horse could continue to haul.

"Finally, we beg to state that by June 1 it would be a physical impossibility, with the facilities in this city, to secure new wheels for more than one-half of the vehicles affected by this measure, and even accomplishing this much would seriously cripple many of the large institutions."

The petition was signed by W. S. Knox, E. S. Alvord, John L. Newbold, Arthur C. Moses, O. H. P. Johnson, P. J. Brennan, L. E. Smoot, the Hoge & McDowell Company, the Anderson Dray and Storage Company, the G. W. Cissell Company, the J. Maury Dove Company, Charles King & Son, Chris. Heurich Brewing Company, F. P. May & Co., Frank Hume, National Capital Brewing Company, Thomas R. Riley, Pabst Brewing Company, Havenner Baking Company, Corby Baking Company, National Motor Company, American Ice Company, Home Ice Company, W. O. Anderson Express Company, Warren Brothers Company, James O. Caton & Sons, J. D. Robinson, V. Baldwin Johnson, Kreig Express Company, Charles Jacobsen, Anacostia Brick Company, W. J. Zeh Company, Merchants' Transfer and Storage Company, Johnson Brothers, George W. Knox Express Company, Brennan Construction Company, Littlefield, Alvord & Co., W. B. Moses' Sons.

Now, that states that the business interests of the city of Washington are unanimous in opposition to the requirement, and, so far as I am aware, there is not a single business man in Washington, not one, who favors this proposition.

I have here also a letter from the George W. Knox Express Company, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 21, 1906.

Hon. J. S. RIXEY, M. C., City.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your favor of the 20th instant, would say that our regulation two-horse wagon weighs, empty, 3,500 pounds. This wagon, with the usual 2½-inch axle, we load with from 5,000 to 6,000 pounds, thus making a total weight of about 4½ tons. These wagons are the standard freight wagons in all cities which you have, no doubt, noted. It is the standard stock wagon of all large manufacturers of wagons. Should a disastrous fire overtake us (as it did a few years ago), it would be against the law for us to get standard wagons from other cities to carry on business until these extraordinary wagons could be built. The same could happen to the mail wagons or other necessary vehicles.

Also the following statement from them:

DEAR SIR: I would call your attention to H. R. bill No. 14897 (Report No. 1679), third section, which is a rider tacked on evidently for the purpose of making a solid road to the Highway Bridge and imposing almost impossible conditions on those doing business in this city, not alone the express companies, but the lumber, coal, brick, ice, wholesale grocers, and, in fact, every industry requiring heavy teaming. I have observed drays in the cities of St. Louis, Detroit, Cleveland, Cincinnati, Philadelphia, New York, Boston, Baltimore, and others, and in every instance the usual width of tire for two-horse wagons is 2½ inches. This width seems to be the standard for such vehicles hauling from 2 to 3 tons. In fact, the standard width of tire is 2½ inches for such vehicles made by the wheel manufacturers throughout the country.

To make such a radical change would require a much longer time than the provisions of this bill allow (June 1, 1906), to say nothing of the enormous expense entailed upon the owners of vehicles. If this width of tire is satisfactory in other cities, why should we be subjected to the provisions of this bill? It would also deny the farmers of the adjacent States the privilege of bringing their produce to this city.

As you well know, we have no voice in this matter, and are, therefore, subject to your sense of fairness and right. As far as taxpaying, nonvoting citizens, we must enter our earnest protest, and ask your support to defeat the measure. We were not even invited to express our views before either the Commissioners of the District of Columbia or the House Committee on the District of Columbia.

I am, with great respect,

Yours, respectfully, THE GEORGE W. KNOX EXPRESS CO.

They also sent me the price list showing what it would cost to put on 4-inch tires on the wagons they now have. For four wheels of 2½-inch tire the list price is $35, and for 4-inch tires the price is, per set, $53.

Littlefield, Alvord & Co. wrote me as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 21, 1906.

Hon. JOHN F. RIXEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your favor of the 20th instant, we have to advise you that the weight of our two-horse express wagons, unloaded, is about 3,000 pounds and loaded about 8,000 pounds. The width of the tires on these wagons is 2½ inches.

Yours, very truly, LITTLEFIELD, ALVORD & CO.
E. S. ALVORD, President.

The chairman of the District Committee has repeated here a statement of a count made of some hay wagons, showing forty-five out of forty-six with 4-inch tires. This statement was made at a hearing of some citizens of Alexandria, who subsequently sent me the following statement. I vouch for the standing and high character of all three of these gentlemen, A. D. Brockett, —— Patterson, and W. A. Smoot, jr. The statement speaks for itself and is as follows:

ALEXANDRIA, VA., April 20, 1906.

Hon. JOHN F. RIXEY,
United States House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I inclose weights of the fourteen wagons, which we secured from the hay scales in Washington yesterday:

Loaded with hay, 6,930, 3,400, 4,265, 8,120, 7,570, 5,100, 5,350, 4,210, 4,775, 4,900, 3,645, 5,085, 11,900, and 8,200 pounds.

Empty wagons, 2,320, 1,325, 1,340, 2,800, 2,400, 1,780, 2,000, 1,935, 1,625, 1,520, 1,410, 1,965, 3,265, and 2,975 pounds.

Will also state that while there we saw only one wagon, and that weighed 5,640 pounds loaded, and 1,600 pounds light, and had a 3-inch tire.

It seems a little remarkable that we were able to find as many 3-inch tires in five minutes or less than the representative of the committee in several days, while he was looking up forty-five wagons.

We wish to say that although we realize that you will do all within your power to defeat this bill on the floor of the House, and that we have done everything that we possibly could to assist you in this respect, that we appreciate your most earnest and tireless efforts in our behalf, regardless of whether the bill is defeated or not.

Yours, very respectfully,

W. A. SMOOT, Jr.

At my instance a count was made on April 17 of wagons which came across the ferry to Washington from Alexandria. There were twenty-nine. Eleven had loads of over 4,000 pounds, and none of them had 4-inch tires. Smoot & Co., of Alexandria, also wrote me:

Hon. JOHN F. RIXEY, No. 2: You can well see the hardship this would work on all of the team owners in Virginia and Maryland as far as going into the District is concerned, and we believe that in looking into the matter you will find that it would have the same effect on District team owners coming out of the District. In other words, it seems to us that this would practically put a wall around the District.

We believe you will see the justice of our contention after considering this matter, and anything you may do in our behalf would be greatly appreciated.

Yours, very truly, SMOOT & CO.

Another unsolicited letter from a prominent citizen of Alexandria engaged in the wholesale lumber business in Washington is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 19, 1906.

Hon. JOHN F. RIXEY, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I notice that the House of Representatives is about to consider the proposed law requiring all wagons that, including the load, may weigh 4,000 pounds shall be equipped with tires 4 inches in width.

I am in the lumber business in this city. If this law should be passed, it would work a direct hardship upon myself and my customers, without, as far as I can see, a compensating benefit to anyone. If not inconsistent with your convictions, I would ask you to oppose its enactment.

Yours, very respectfully, E. H. O'BRIEN,
Alexandria, Va.

The following letters also speak for themselves:

ALEXANDRIA, VA., April 23, 1906.

Hon. JOHN F. RIXEY.

DEAR SIR: I understand there is a bill before Congress to require all wagons coming into Washington that weigh, when loaded, more than 4,000 pounds to have 4-inch tires, or the parties owning same are liable to a fine or imprisonment.

I, as well as most all farmers, know that this bill if passed will cause much trouble and inconvenience, besides a useless expense.

Therefore please protest against this bill, and by so doing you will favor us greatly.

Very respectfully, BENJ. P. HUNTER.

ANACOSTIA, D. C., April 19, 1906.

Hon. JOHN F. RIXEY.

DEAR SIR: I, in behalf of myself and others, who have teams working on the streets of Washington, do ask you to help us in the fight against wide-tread tire wagons, as I have used them and they are very much against our work. In the first place, they are too heavy for working in mud, and they will turn over very easily on the dump. When we have to dump our dirt the tires are so wide that they will not hold, but slide on the bank.

If such should become a law, it will work a hardship on the poor man or woman who has teams trying to work for a living, for the price is so small for our teams. The price we get is $3.50 per day for double teams, and if we had the change to make it would be quite an expense, for the wheels would cost about $35 or $40 per set.

Hoping you will help us to win out, by so doing you will help the poor workingmen of Washington and vicinity who have teams.

Trusting that you will give this your prompt attention,

I am, respectfully,

W. F. WHALEY.

A letter from the Business Men's Association, of Washington, D. C., is as follows:

MARCH 9, 1906.

Hon. JOHN F. RIXEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: At a largely attended meeting of the board of directors of the Business Men's Association, held March 8, House bill No. 14897 came up before the board and was thoroughly discussed; and on motion of Mr. W. S. Knox, duly seconded by Mr. P. Brennan, it was resolved that the association go on record as being unalterably opposed to the third section of said bill, it being agreed that the adoption of said section would work an unnecessary hardship and unwarranted expense to the owners and users of teams hauling 2 tons or more. It was further agreed that the association use its good offices and every honorable means to defeat said legislation in becoming a law.

Very truly, yours,

JAS F. OYSTER, President.
WM. F. GUDE, Secretary.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to be contended here by certain gentlemen, and taken for granted almost without argument, that the wide tire is necessarily much less injurious to the streets and ought to be adopted no matter what the wishes of the business people of the city may be. I have here a work on roads and pavements, by Baker, and I think it throws at least great doubt upon the wisdom of this provision. I will read two or three extracts:

Although there is not much difference between the tractive power of broad and narrow tires, the latter are much more destructive on any road, particularly on an earth one; but in deciding upon the proper width of tire there are other factors besides the road that must be considered. If wagons were employed only upon the public highway, it might be wise to use wide tires and sacrifice some tractive power for the benefit of the roads. Other things being equal, a wagon with broad tires is not so easily managed as one with narrow tires. To be equally easy to turn, the broad-tired wagon should have the narrower bed, or the longer front axle, or the smaller front wheel. In Europe it is customary to adopt the smaller front wheel, which is very destructive of the broken-stone roads so common in that country. Increasing the length of axle interferes with getting the wagon up to cribs, warehouses, etc., and increases the difficulty in going through gates, passing buildings, and the like, and hence it is not clear that laws should be passed regulating the width of tires, many claims to the contrary notwithstanding.

The best argument against the enactment of laws concerning broad tires is found in the fact that the numerous and long-enforced English statutes on this matter have of late years been abrogated, a century of experience having shown that they are difficult to administer and generally disadvantageous. The Massachusetts highway commission, after an elaborate discussion of the subject, says: "It is a matter of doubtful expediency to endeavor, in the present state of our highways, by general legislation, to control the width of tires or the diameter of wheels."

It is probably best to leave the matter to private individuals and the enterprise of manufacturers. The matter should at least be left to local authorities to pass regulations which shall be suited to their particular conditions. Several States and cities have laws regulating the width of tires, but it does not appear that broad tires are any more common there than in localities where no such laws exist.

Many European countries have laws regulating the width of tires. In England for one hundred years the law required 1 inch of tire for each 500 pounds of load, but all laws regulating the width of tires have been repealed.

Mr. Chairman, there is another provision in this bill which strikes me as being most extraordinary and harsh. I refer to the latter part of section 3. That section provides that there shall be 4-inch tires on all wagons weighing, when loaded, 4,500 pounds, with the further provision that any owner or driver or other person in control of such wagon or other vehicle so using, operating, or propelling the same who shall violate the provisions of said section, shall, on conviction thereof in the police court of the District of Columbia, be punished by a fine not exceeding $25, or by imprisonment for not more than sixty days, or both. This would be a harsh provision anywhere, but especially so here in the District of Columbia—a narrow strip of land between the States of Maryland and Virginia. The only way a wagon can go from the State of Virginia from a section of probably 50 miles on the other side of the Potomac, into Maryland, or from Maryland into Virginia, is to pass through and over this narrow strip of land of the District of Columbia. The owner of a wagon must stop and change his 2½-inch to 4-inch tires before he can cross or pass through Washington. No exception if his wagon and load together weigh 4,500 pounds. Failure to stop and provide himself with a new equipment makes him liable to be taken before the police court and fined $25 and perhaps, in addition, jailed for sixty days. I understand that in the city of Washington the fines all go for the support of the police department. The gentlemen on the Committee of the District of Columbia may know whether I am correct in this statement. If that is true, what chance would a countryman have of escaping these interested detectives? They might, perhaps, omit the imprisonment, but the fine, never.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman what occasion people from Virginia would have to drive through the District of Columbia to get into the State of Maryland?

Mr. RIXEY. Why, there is continual traffic over the bridges, I suppose.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. What occasion would anyone have with a load such as stated?

Mr. RIXEY. There is a good deal of traffic and traved between the States of Virginia and Maryland.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I mean with a heavy load.

Mr. RIXEY. A good many loads go through here, just as they do from one county to another. There are bridges across the river here, and there is no impediment. You are now seeking to erect a barrier.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I am asking for the occasion that would make it necessary for a man to drive through with that kind of a load.

Mr. RIXEY. There is considerable commerce between the State of Virginia and the State of Maryland.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. With what kind of a load?

Mr. RIXEY. Oh, I could not tell you what kind. There may be loads that are hauled by farmers from one section of the country to another section. The provision for fine and imprisonment is a harsh and unjust one, and even if the law were a proper one such a provision ought not to be permitted. I have challenged the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, and I challenge the gentleman who sits in front of me, a member of the committee, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], who, I believe, attends very regularly the meetings of the committee, to say whether he knows of any business interests in the city of Washington that favor this third section of the bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. My friend from Virginia, I think, attended one of the hearings that was given on section 3 of this bill.

Mr. RIXEY. I did.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Does he not recall now that one after another business men in the District of Columbia came forward and supported section 3 of this bill?

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, I attended one meeting of the District Committee on this subject. That was when the people from Alexandria came over, and the committee only gave a half an hour—from half past 10 o'clock to 11, I believe it was—and then closed the hearing. Not a single man spoke in favor of this wide-tire provision during the hearing given the people of Alexandria.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I am unfortunate in not being able to remember names, but I remember distinctly of a number of men saying that they were in favor of it.

Mr. RIXEY. Business men?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Business men.

Mr. RIXEY. Not while I was there.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That may be.

Mr. RIXEY. Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman does not throw much light upon that. I have shown the resolution adopted by the business men's meeting in the city of Washington, where they unanimously condemned that third section. The committee has not referred the third section to the District Commissioners. The business men say that the District Commissioners are opposed to the third section. Who favors it? So far as I know, absolutely nobody favors this third section except the Committee on the District of Columbia.

I ask the gentleman who sits in front of me, and who has spoken so often about carrying out the wishes of the people, if he does not think the wishes of the people of the District of Columbia ought to be respected in a matter which so nearly concerns them? They help to support by their taxes the paving of the streets. They live here. They are in business. Ought they not to be consulted? They have nobody upon this floor to represent them. The District Commissioners are expected to some extent to represent their views, and yet the District Committee refuse their request to refer the bill to the District Commissioners for recommendation.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will ask my friend if the bill has not been before the Commissioners?

Mr. RIXEY. As I am informed, it never has.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Was not the original resolution in which this provision was carried before the District Commissioners?

Mr. RIXEY. I understand it never was. The original resolutions—there were two of them, one introduced at the instance of the War Department, to extend the time for the completion of the Highway Bridge, the other introduced by myself to extend the time for the demolition of the old Long Bridge—were referred to the District Commissioners, but section 3 never, as I am informed.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That was an amendment that was made by the committee, and my friend from Virginia well knows that when a bill is amended by a committee that it is not customary to refer it. If the District Commissioners are opposed to this bill I think I know them well enough to be able to state that they would make their protest against it if they were so opposed to it.

Mr. RIXEY. Well, I can imagine that the District Commissioners do not like to rush in on a matter as to which their views were not sought. I am informed by a statement in one of the papers here that former Commissioner Black reported against a similar provision. I wrote to the present Engineer Commissioner Biddle that I understood his predecessor, Colonel Black, had reported against it, and asked him to send me a copy of Colonel Black's report. This courteous request was discourteously treated and no reply made.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Evidently he was not opposed to the bill.

Mr. RIXEY. I do not know his views, but he should have answered my letter at least. The business men at their meeting, a copy of whose resolution I have read, stated that they were informed that the District Commissioners were opposed to this bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will ask my friend if these business men were not each of them men who were directly affected by the terms and provisions of section 3 of this bill?

Mr. RIXEY. Why, certainly they were; why not?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. They were affected by the terms of the bill, and, therefore, were against it.

Mr. RIXEY. Most assuredly they were interested, and so state, as follows:

> We also beg to state that this matter has not been in any way referred to the business interests of Washington. The undersigned committee of seven men, appointed at a meeting of the board of trade, themselves own 793 wagons and 970 horses, and 75 per cent of the business interests of Washington were present at this meeting.

What class of people should be heard and their interests consulted and protected if not the people affected? If they had a representative upon this floor their voices would be heard and their interests considered. It is because they have no representative here; it is because the District Commissioners have not been consulted that the third section of this bill is brought in against their wishes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I would like to ask the gentleman a fair question. Is it not as much the duty of the Commissioners of the city of Washington to protest against bad legislation as to affirm good legislation?

Mr. RIXEY. I do not understand that the Commissioners volunteer in these matters.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It is not their duty?

Mr. SIMS. It is their duty when the bills are referred to them by the committee.

Mr. RIXEY. Is it not the custom in the Committee on the District of Columbia on important bills to refer them to the District Commissioners for a recommendation?

Mr. SIMS. Concerning local city affairs; yes, sir. I was under the impression that the original bill had been, but it seems that it never was referred to them.

Mr. RIXEY. I think I have shown that the only people in favor of this provision, or rather the parties who have suggested it, are the members of the District Committee themselves. And how do they represent the wishes of the people of the District of Columbia? I say it is just such legislation as this that has built up public sentiment to the effect that the District of Columbia ought to be governed by its mayor and city council, or have a Representative and voice upon this floor. The condition is worse now than it was eight or ten years ago. I remember very well when the Member from the district now represented by me was always on the Committee on the District of Columbia, and, until a recent date, the State of Maryland had two Members on the District Committee, but the gentlemen [Mr. MUDD and Mr. PEARRE] have both been removed from the committee, and I have heard it was the policy of the Speaker of this House to appoint no man upon the District Committee whose district adjoins the District of Columbia. In this way the voice of the people of the District of Columbia can not be heard except by a reference of bills to the District Commissioners, and that course ought always to be pursued.

Now, let us see how it works. Who constitutes the District Committee of this House? I will only take two or three as representing the majority and minority. The first three Republican members of that committee are the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK], who is chairman; the next upon the committee is the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH], and the third upon the committee is the gentleman from Maine [Mr. ALLEN]. So far as the Republican members are concerned—that is, the ranking members—the Speaker has gone to the remote sections of the country to select them. How is it with the Democratic members? The first upon the committee is the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] and the second upon the committee is the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MEYER]. Are these gentlemen prepared to speak ex cathedra for the people of the city of Washington without consulting them? The people of Washington have no voice except through the District Commissioners. They were not given their representation in this case, and it was left to gentlemen who hail from remote sections of the United States to suggest a measure of this sort for the guidance of the people of the city of Washington.

Mr. Chairman, there seems to be but two requisites for membership upon the District Committee, as laid down and followed by the Speaker. The first is that the members must come from the remotest sections of the country, and secondly, they must absolutely know nothing about what the people of the city of Washington want. They must be ignorant of what they are to legislate upon, and then they must be so far away that their own constituents will not hold them responsible for what they do here. A grosser case of want of representation can not exist anywhere than prevails under the practice of the House here in regard to the District of Columbia.

I have never been an advocate for popular suffrage in the District of Columbia. I have always been willing that it should be governed in some other way; but it is just such legislation as this, and it is just such rules as are enforced in the making up of the committee, that satisfies me that a change should be made and the people of this city given at least a Delegate upon this floor.

If this was any other city in the United States, legislated for by the city council and by the mayor, the business people of the city would be consulted, and not for one moment would a law of this sort be placed upon the record of the city providing, as was said by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], for an absolute disregard of every man who was interested in the proposed legislation. Who ought to be consulted in a matter of this sort if not the people who own the wagons, who own the horses, who contribute to the wealth of the community in the business in which they are engaged, who pay the taxes and have a right to the use of the streets?

Mr. Chairman, it is said that the use of 2½-inch tires cuts the streets of Washington. It was shown by the District Committee in one of the hearings in which there were three gentlemen from the city of Alexandria that there was not a 4-inch tire wagon in the city of Alexandria; and whilst many people are in the habit of speaking rather contemptuously of the streets of Alexandria, I say here that there are some streets there which might set an example for the people who build the pavements in the city of Washington. In that city there is not a 4-inch tire wagon, and one of the witnesses before the District Committee testified that he owned twenty-eight wagons. He is an expressman, and he gave an instance, I remember, showing the hardship of the proposed provision. He said, "I have an engagement to bring my wagons here to the city of Washington to-morrow over the ferry and move a citizen of the city of Washington to Lorton station, down in Virginia."

This hearing was granted when the roads were muddy. "If," said he, "this requirement was now law and I had to bring 4-inch tires here I could not move that man, because I could not get over the roads."

I do not see why we should put a wall around the District of Columbia. The city of Richmond does not have a requirement of this sort, the little city of Norfolk does not have it, the city of Baltimore does not have it, and the city of Philadelphia does not have it; and if the pavements in the city of Washington are not sufficient, then you could improve upon them by putting other pavements down. There may be and is great doubt as to whether these pavements are proper pavements or not. In the winter time, in the case of sleet or even ordinary rain, they are so slippery that horses can hardly stand. In the summer time you might as well be by the side of a barrel of tar on fire. They say it cuts the pavements. Why, sir——

Mr. PRINCE. What is there about 5,000 lame horses in the District of Columbia on account of these pavements?

Mr. RIXEY. I really do not know anything about the merits of that statement. I have heard that the lameness was caused to some extent by these asphalt pavements.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. They are generally these bobtailed ones, that have got tails about that long [indicating], that drive up and down Pennsylvania avenue.

Mr. RIXEY. I understood, on the contrary, that they are the long-tailed horses—the horses that draw the wagons and make commerce go. I understand these asphalt pavements are pleasant enough for the automobile and for the rubber-tired wagons and buggies and carriages. But if they do not bear the ordinary traffic which the city streets ought to bear, then we ought to have a different pavement here.

For some reason, I do not know why, this city seems to have adopted the asphalt in preference to all other kinds of pavements. Nobody challenges the propriety of having that kind of pavement. It is accepted as the Washington pavement. Yet even a lady's boot passing over these streets in summertime will leave its impress there. If you are going to prohibit everything from the streets that makes a mark upon the streets, that makes an indenture in the pavement, then you will have to keep off the streets not only the 45-hundredweight wagon, but you will have to keep off the street the horses and the men, and even the women.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I care to consume any more time upon this proposition. I want to state that so far as I am advised this third section of the bill will work a hardship upon the people whom I especially represent and want to serve. It is also a hardship upon the business people of this city, whose interests are so contemptuously treated here, the statement being in substance that of course they are against it, but what right have they to complain?

It is shown here that there are many people across the river, especially in the city of Alexandria, who transact business in the city of Washington. Alexandria is the wholesale place for drugs and many groceries for the city of Washington. They are sent here in wagons. Much of the lumber comes here. Produce comes here. Nearly all the wagons weigh, when loaded, over 4,500 pounds. It would require all these people to put 4-inch tires upon their wagons, if they come here. It would act as a hardship upon other sections, and especially it would act as a hardship upon the people of the city of Washington who have protested.

It is up to this House to say whether, against the wishes of the people of Washington and of the District of Columbia, it will insist on forcing this legislation upon the city of Washington. It seems to me to be a great hardship to do so. This third section should be stricken out. So far as the first and second sections of the bill are concerned, I agree with the gentleman from Wisconsin that those sections ought to be adopted. He has given his pledge to the Pennsylvania Railroad that it should be paid for the cost of operating the Long Bridge until Congress could provide for it, and I am willing that that pledge shall be made good. Let the third section be struck out and the bill then passed.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That on and after Monday, the 12th day of February, 1906, and until the time fixed for the removal of said Long Bridge, the said bridge shall be under the control of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and shall be maintained and kept in repair by them out of appropriations to be provided by Congress for such purposes: Provided, however, That the said railroad company, or its successors, shall maintain said Long Bridge after Monday, the 12th day of February, 1906, until the appropriation to be made by Congress, as aforesaid, is available to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia: And provided further, That the said railroad company, or its successors, be reimbursed for its actual reasonable expenditures for the said maintenance of said Long Bridge, last above mentioned, until said appropriation for its maintenance by the said Commissioners becomes available; and for such purpose the sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated and payable from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, one-half chargeable against the revenues of the District of Columbia and one-half against the United States.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend section 2, line 25, page 2, by striking out the word "one-half;" and in line 1, page 3, strike out the words "and one-half against the;" and in line 2 strike out all of the line "United States."

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 25, strike out the word "one-half;" on page 3, lines 1 and 2, strike out the words "and one-half against the United States."

Mr. SIMS. I will state why I make this motion. The Long Bridge was maintained by the Pennsylvania Railroad and was no expense to the District of Columbia or to the Government of the United States. The Long Bridge was used by the Washington and Mount Vernon Electric Railway Company, and it paid a rental to the Pennsylvania Railroad Company. Now the new highway bridge has been constructed and the Pennsylvania Railroad Company is relieved from any maintenance of the new highway bridge. The Washington and Mount Vernon Electric Railway Company uses the new highway bridge and pays a certain sum for each passenger. The continuation of the Long Bridge for the purpose of permitting this work to be done ought not to be maintained, as I contend, at the expense of the Government of the United States for any part thereof, for this reason: The Washington and Mount Vernon Electric Railway Company pays its entire rental to the District of Columbia. In other words, the District of Columbia gets all the revenue of the new highway bridge that used to be paid by the Mount Vernon Railway to the Pennsylvania Railway for occupying and using the Long Bridge.

The maintenance of the new highway bridge is one-half paid by the District of Columbia and the other half by the United States. Therefore, as the District gets all the revenue from the new bridge, and then after the construction of the new bridge the use of the old bridge has been continued by this bill, therefore I think it equitable and just that the amount paid for the maintenance of the old bridge should be paid entirely out of the District revenues, because the District gets all the revenues of the new bridge. It is this matter of equity that caused me to make this motion. If the revenues of the new bridge were divided equally, one-half going to the Treasury of the United States and the other going to the District, then it would be right for this Long Bridge to be maintained half and half; but inasmuch as all the revenues go to the District from the new bridge and one-half of the maintenance of the new bridge comes out of the United States, I think the expense of the Long Bridge being temporarily maintained for the benefit of the new bridge should be paid entirely by the District of Columbia.

Mr. BABCOCK. I hope the House will agree to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That from and after the 1st day of January, 1907, every wagon or other vehicle of whatsoever kind or description weighing, when loaded, more than 2 tons, used, operated, or propelled on, over, or across any of the streets, avenues, alleys, bridges, or roadways of the District of Columbia, shall have wheel tires not less than 4 inches broad. Any owner or driver or other person in control of such wagon or other vehicle so using, operating, or propelling the same who shall violate the provisions of this section, shall, on conviction thereof in the police court of the District of Columbia, be punished by a fine not exceeding $25, or by imprisonment for not more than sixty days, or both.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

Line 6, strike out the words "two tons" and insert the words "four thousand five hundred pounds."

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MUDD. I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 3, strike out the word "January" and insert in lieu thereof the word "July."

Mr. MUDD. Just a word, Mr. Chairman. I do not believe that this section ought to be adopted as a part of this bill, and yet I do not intend to take up but a very little time of the committee in protesting against it. I have had more requests to vote against this section than for any piece of legislation that has come to my attention during this session of Congress.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. By whom?

Mr. MUDD. Not excepting the rate bill, the Philippine tariff bill, or any other matter of national importance.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Who requested it?

Mr. MUDD. The farmers of my district; and it seems to me the farmers of the gentleman's district and their Representative would feel a sort of sympathetic interest in the farming interest of my State. I thought we were together until this afternoon, when the gentleman has changed from the interest of the farmers and joined the broad-wheeled-wagon salesmen.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I don't know but that I ought to come back and help you out. [Laughter.]

Mr. MUDD. I can not see any reason for legislation of this character unless it be in the interest of some wagon trust. [Laughter.] The chairman at the head of the committee has not enlightened the House as to why this section was put in. I am credibly informed that the District Commissioners have not asked it to be put in. I have heard nothing from any citizen of the District of Columbia in favor of this proposition; and Mr. Chairman, since I have been a Member of this House, and have been for several sessions, and by many people am now thought to be a member of the District of Columbia Committee, there are few things of interest in the District of Columbia that I am not asked to do something about or for on one side or the other.

I do not know the width of the wheels of all wagons in my district. I am not acquainted with all the wagons in my district, but I think I do know most of the owners and drivers of the wagons, and I am interested in them. I want to protect their interests. It is the period of the year, or the period of the year is approaching, in which I think every Representative of a farming community ought to see to it that his people and their interests are not trampled upon by any such drastic legislation as this. The spring crops are coming on, and the fall crops—and, it may be the fall fences—will soon need looking after. [Laughter.] The farmers need us now. We will need the farmers a little later on.

But there is another matter; there is another kind of wagon that I have in my mind's eye. I know a Congressman from Maryland who owns in his own right a band wagon, who carries the members of his band and their musical instruments and the driver, and sometimes himself, and I have seen that wagon with that aggregation of its human freight so heavily loaded [laughter]——

Mr. GRAHAM. The men or the wagon?

Mr. MUDD. I hope the gentleman will not press me too closely upon that point. I think, perhaps, that that particular vehicle, thus freighted and thus filled as I have described it, would sometimes exceed the limit of 4,500 pounds, for which this bill prescribes these wide-tire wheels.

They have political meetings at which that band wagon performs just across the line of this District, out here in Prince George County, Md.

I hope it shall not come to this, Mr. Chairman, that this Member of Congress with his band wagon can hold political meetings almost within sight of this Capitol, can come to the top of Good Hope Hill over yonder where he can look down at eventide upon this city, like unto Moses when he looked down from off the mountain to the Promised Land, and not be permitted to enter it, because of the narrow-minded, broad-wheeled legislation of this kind, which is aimed to strike down the interests and the liberties of the people of my district and the neighboring sister districts of the State of Virginia. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, then, Mr. Chairman, my amendment is for this purpose. If this foul blow is to fall upon my people and upon their brethren across the Potomac in Virginia, I want at least to ask this committee to join hands with me in postponing the advent of the evil day by incorporating in this provision the amendment which I have submitted, by which we shall forestall and forfend the coming of it, and our people shall be relieved of it until at least one year from next July, that they may adjust their situation and accommodate their necessities to the grinding and exacting conditions that an extortionate wagon trust is about to inflict upon them through the instrumentality of this committee. [Applause.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I would like to ask the gentleman if he will accept this amendment: "Provided, That this section shall not apply to the Mudd band wagon?"

Mr. MUDD. I should be inclined to accept that, but I am not sure that I ought to put down the name of the wagon in just that form in the record.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I hope the committee will agree to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland. I think it is a wise and good one.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, I propose at the proper time to strike out section 3, but as the first thing in order would be to perfect the section I offer the following amendment to come at the end of the section:

Provided, however, That this section shall not apply to vehicles other than those loaded with brick coming into the District of Columbia.

That leaves it to apply to brick wagons and does not apply to other wagons that come into the District of Columbia.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, that would be clearly out of order; that is class legislation.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee rose.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman from Tennessee a member of the District Committee?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. No, Mr. Chairman, but I have been alluded to several times in the cross fire that has been going on.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to say that I do not have any personal interest in this matter. I know my friend from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY] has sound judgment, and ordinarily I am willing to yield to his judgment about most anything and also to my friend from Maryland [Mr. MUDD]. But I want to call the attention of these gentlemen to the fact that the city of Washington, thank God, does not belong to Maryland or to Virginia or any one State. Congress is the city council to look after the interests of this city. It is the duty of each Member to do his part. It seems to me that the committee has been very considerate in this matter—this measure is not to take effect until next January. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia have not been reared in the country, as some of us have been. They may be good military men and good professional men, etc., but they may not know anything about broad and narrow tires. They are not men who have been down on the ground floor like many of us, who who know that a narrow tire does cut up the streets. I know that a broad tire does not to the same extent as a narrow one.

My friend from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY] alludes to what the mayor or somebody in Richmond says. Richmond has a heavy cobblestone pavement, so the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB], who comes from Richmond, informed me a moment ago. Of course a tire 2½ inches in width or only a half an inch in width, as narrow almost as a knife blade, would have very little effect on that heavy granite pavement.

The interested and selfish expressmen seem to have had a meeting of their own in the city of Washington, and petition Congress to protect their interests, when the great voice of the people is the other way, I infer, because, as I understand it, the Commissioners of the District represent, or should represent, the people, and the Commissioners have not protested, either as individuals or as Commissioners. So we must presume that they are representing the great body of the people in favoring this legislation. The law does not take effect at once. Our wagon tires wear out—unlike Members of Congress. They are serviceable. They do the people some good, and they do the farmer some good, and the result is that a wagon tire does wear out some time. I think the life of a wagon tire, as near as I can remember, is from twelve to eighteen months, particularly the tires on the hind wheels. We all know that the heavy wagon has on it usually what is known as a "slow lock," which rubs and rapidly wears the tire.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to be permitted to proceed for one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, as I say, the time when this law will go into effect has been extended. In that length of time, some fourteen months, these tires will have almost worn away, and certainly those that have been already wearing, because we presume the tires now used have been used for some time. So it will be seen that by the time this becomes a law the wagons will, as a rule, need new tires. Much, if any, of the loss we hear about will be incidental or inevitable whether we enact this bill or not. We know that we ought to preserve the streets. No one disputes that these narrow tires do cut up the streets. We know that we step in holes in the streets, particularly at night, and that automobiles and carriages get into them day and night.

I have the greatest respect for my friend from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY], and he knows that I would favor him in a minute in a personal or purely local matter, but it is our duty to the American people to preserve this great city that belongs to the American people and to make the people surrounding the city of Washington, as well as those who live within its borders, even if it be express conpanies, deal fairly by the people and the whole nation. Hence my position here to-day in this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has again expired.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the time extended for one minute. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. The gentleman talked as though he owned the city of Washington.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Oh, no. If I did I would divide with my friend from Virginia.

Mr. RIXEY. I was under the impression that the gentleman represented the city of Nashville.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. No; I do not. I represent five counties, one of which includes Nashville.

Mr. RIXEY. What is the regulation in Nashville?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. There is a regulation, I think, there requiring heavy wagons to have broad tires. Besides that we have cobblestone streets—the main streets—and some new kind of asphaltum in the residential localities.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I have heard the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] talk on more than one occasion about the necessity and the propriety and the righteousness of giving the people of the District of Columbia some representation, some voice in the government.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Indeed I am for that now.

Mr. RIXEY. Then how does the gentleman reconcile that with the fact that this section has not only not been referred to the District Commissioners, but the statement is made here that they are opposed to it, and the further fact that a meeting of the business men of the city of Washington, representing 75 per cent of all the business transacted in the city of Washington——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. In wagons.

Mr. RIXEY. Well, in wagons—business transacted with wagons, and in that way, the sentiment was unanimously against this bill.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Without a single petition being filed, without a single man coming up here to protest against it, as I understand it. The body of the "people" has not petitioned against this, as I am informed.

Mr. RIXEY. I will say to the gentleman that the District Committee, in the first place, never gave anybody an opportunity. The people never heard of it until this bill was reported, and then they protested vigorously, and the bill was recommitted to the same committee and it was like trying a case before a judge who had not only made up his mind, but entered his decree, and only as a matter of courtesy agreed to allow the losing party to complain.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I understand that the names you read here a while ago were "transfer men." There are other people who have rights besides them. I know my friend himself recognizes that.

Mr. RIXEY. Is there anybody in favor of it?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I presume people are in favor of it or otherwise there would be protests here.

Mr. RIXEY. But, my friend, the parties who represent the people of the District of Columbia are the District Commissioners.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Then why did they fail to protest?

Mr. RIXEY. It has been stated here that it is customary for the District Committee to refer to the District Commissioners. The gentleman from Tennessee, Judge SIMS, a member of the committee, stated the fact that it has been a uniform custom. That custom was not followed in this case; in fact, I am informed that this bill is opposed by the Commissioners and by the business interests of the city.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I hope that section 3 will be stricken out of the bill. As the gentleman from Virginia says, it was not referred to the proper authorities of the District to be passed upon, and I will venture now to say that if a plebiscite of the people of Washington should be taken upon this question the proposition to require these 4-inch tires on wagons in the District, in accordance with the provisions of this bill, would be voted down by a vote of two to one. My friend from Tennessee seems to think that there has been no protest. A great many people in the District have been to me—and I think probably a great many of them have been to other Members of Congress—protesting, and they were not all transfer companies either; none of them who came to me were.

Among other gentlemen, I happen to recall Mr. McDowell, who has a flour mill down here, and he told me, among other things, this would cost them, and everybody else engaged in the business here, a very large amount of money. I do not know how much it would cost the people of the District altogether, but it looks to me like it is oppressive. If there were any need for it, if it did any good, it might be well. This is a dirt-road proposition, or a gravel-road proposition. When a heavily loaded wagon goes over a dirt road with these narrow tires it cuts into it, but I have never seen it affect stone pavements—good asphalt. For country roads it might be a good law; undoubtedly would be if the roads were of dirt.

Mr. BABCOCK. The gentleman has seen holes in the street.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course I have seen holes in the street, and I know holes do get in the street, but I have never seen anything like the ruts that are made by the tires of these vehicles when running on dirt roads, and I do not believe the gentleman can show me one in the entire city of Washington. Of course I have seen where the asphalt had broken, and of course that has to be repaired, and repairing is going on all the time.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Now, just on that proposition. The committee gave a hearing, and members of the police force who had been giving attention to the matter told us the narrow-tired, heavily loaded wagons would cut down into the asphalt. Another wagon would come along and cut just a little deeper, and within three or four days there would be one of these holes that are so numerous on Pennsylvania avenue.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Three or four days?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then we would not have had any asphalt pavement at all. They would have been destroyed faster than we could construct them.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The asphalt pavement from the Peace Monument to the Treasury is full of holes to-day, and it is largely due, so the police say, to heavily loaded, narrow-tired wagons cutting the pavement.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, Mr. Chairman, from the standpoint of the Elysian fields of Kansas, this may be an awfully bad pavement from the Peace Monument down to the Treasury, but from my poor little standpoint of the pavements I have seen in the world it is a pretty good pavement, and we are all, I think, very proud of it.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. There are a good many holes in it, and it costs annually large sums of money to keep it in repair.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; and I notice, by the way, they are not cut; not that sort of holes. They are round holes or square holes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. What I wanted to impress on the gentleman from Mississippi is that the policemen say these narrow tires first make a narrow cut, then another wagon cuts into the same place, and in that way the round and square holes are started.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that, and then you said that another wagon came along, and then "in three or four days they cut through the asphalt."

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The holes that are constantly being made and repaired all along Pennsylvania avenue are made just as described by the police.

Mr. WILLIAMS. These witnesses went a little too far, because if it took two or three days only to cut through the asphalt we would not have any asphalt in the city at all, especially on Pennsylvania avenue. On the other pavements it is not required, even if required on the asphalt, and I do not think it is required there. But it is absolute oppression to the people who are engaged in business here. Washington is not much of a business city, it is true——

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask if there is anything pending?

Mr. WILLIAMS. But it is hard on the men with delivery wagons and all that, and a hardship on the country people who bring goods into town.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY], which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BABCOCK. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 40, noes 48.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, I now move to strike out the third section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia moves to strike out the third section.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. RIXEY. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 36, noes 49.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No quorum present, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] A quorum present.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I call for tellers on the motion itself.

The motion was agreed to; and the Chair appointed Mr. BABCOCK and Mr. WILLIAMS as tellers.

The committee again divided; and there were—ayes 43, noes 64.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I move that this bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. BABCOCK. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Thereupon the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LITTLEFIELD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 18442) to fix and regulate the salaries of teachers, school officers, and other employees of the board of education of the District of Columbia, and the bill (H. R. 14897) providing for the temporary maintenance of the Long Bridge over the Potomac River, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same to the House with amendments and with a recommendation that the bills as amended do pass.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, if it is the proper time, I ask the present consideration of the bill H. R. 18442.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on the amendment?

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote on the amendment. I do not know how it is numbered in the bill, but it is an amendment placing the appointment of the board of education with the supreme court instead of the Commissioners. I demand a separate vote on that.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I move the previous question on that bill and the amendments thereto to its final passage.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 105, nays 5.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the House were to adjourn now, would this particular matter come up to-morrow as unfinished business, or not until the next District day?

The SPEAKER. It would go over until next District day, as the Chair understands, unless the previous question is ordered.

Mr. BABCOCK. The previous question has been ordered, I understand, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment than the one indicated? If not, the vote will be taken on the other amendments in gross.

The question was taken; and the amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the remaining amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "members," in line 9, page 1, strike out everything down to the word "of," in line 4, page 2, and insert "all of whom shall have been for five years immediately preceding their appointment bona fide residents of the District of Columbia. The members of the board of education shall be appointed by the supreme court judges;" so that the passage will read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That the control of the public schools of the District of Columbia is hereby vested in a board of education to consist of nine members, all of whom shall have been for five years immediately preceding their appointment bona fide residents of the District of Columbia. The members of the board of education shall be appointed by the supreme court judges of the District of Columbia, for terms of three years each, except that the original appointments under this act shall be as follows."

And also in section 2, page 2, line 10, strike out the word "Commissioners" and insert "judges of the supreme court."

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The previous question having been ordered, if the House were to adjourn now would this business come up to-morrow morning as unfinished business?

The SPEAKER. In the judgment of the Chair, yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then I express the hope that the gentleman from Wisconsin may allow the House to adjourn now. It is 20 minutes after 5.

Mr. BABCOCK. I think it will take only about twenty minutes to dispose of this.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If you do that you will have to go into another bill, and it will take some more time. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Secretary of War, submitting an estimate of appropriation for replacement of signal stores of the Army destroyed at Seattle—to the Committee on Appropriations; and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, submitting an estimate of appropriation for education in Alaska—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Secretary of War, submitting an estimate of appropriation for construction and repair of hospitals at San Francisco—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Secretary of War, submitting an estimate of appropriation for replacement of law library in the office of the judge-advocate, department of California, destroyed by the earthquake—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. BIRDSALL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 134) establishing an additional recording district in Indian Territory, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 4206); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 13193) to prohibit the killing of wild birds and other wild animals in the District of Columbia, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 4207); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. BIRDSALL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 14173) to provide a temporary substitute for the United States district judge in the Territory of Hawaii, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 4208); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. PARKER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 16013) providing medals for certain persons, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 4209); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 18498) for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of General Orders, No. 195, War Department, June 20, 1863, for the presentation of medals, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 4210); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

SENATE.

TUESDAY, May 15, 1906.

Prayer by Rev. ULYSSES G. B. PIERCE, of the city of Washington.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. KEAN, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Journal stands approved.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I rise to a question of personal privilege. I will state as preliminary that I had expected and desired to do this yesterday, but in the hurry and rush and turmoil which preceded the adjournment I did not get an opportunity. I intended to do it as a matter of justice both to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] and to myself, but the opportunity, as I said, did not occur, and I deem it necessary this morning.

In the Washington Post of yesterday will be found a reported interview with myself headed "Aldrich sought the credit." I merely desire to say, Mr. President, that it is not my habit to give out for publication private conversations with Senators, and while I talk more or less freely with the newspaper men and have no special complaint to make in this instance, there are in it errors of form and of statement—I mean as to words and facts—and I desire to say that I gave out no such interview as this purports to be.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator has made this disclaimer. I myself do not notice things of this sort, but I have never seen so many misstatements gathered in one small paragraph as there were in the statement to which the Senator has alluded.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 17133. An act to amend section 558 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia; and

H. R. 18666. An act to provide for the reassessment of benefits in the matter of the extension and widening of Sherman avenue, in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

BRIDGE ACROSS PEND D'OREILLE RIVER, WASHINGTON.

Mr. PILES. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6128) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Pend d'Oreille River, in Stevens County, Wash., by the Pend d'Oreille Development Company, to report it favorably without amendment, and I submit a report thereon. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SCHOOLS IN ALASKA.

Mr. TELLER. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to report back favorably without amendment the concurrent resolution which I introduced yesterday, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The concurrent resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to use, at his discretion, for the native schools and reindeer enterprises in Alaska, the unexpended balance of "the license fund for schools outside of incorporated towns in Alaska," which was collected for schools in Alaska previous to January 27, 1905, the same being, after outstanding obligations are paid, $6,221.84, and is hereby appropriated for such purpose.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from Colorado, inasmuch as the resolution provides for the appropriation of money, whether it should not be a joint rather than a concurrent resolution.

Mr. TELLER. It should be a joint resolution. I forgot to make that change. The clerks at the desk can make it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The concurrent resolution will be changed to a joint resolution, and as so changed will be read.

The joint resolution (S. R. 59) relative to the appropriation for the native schools and reindeer enterprise in Alaska was read twice by its title.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TELLER. I beg leave to have inserted in the RECORD a very brief statement from the Bureau of Education, showing the necessity of the joint resolution, so that the House may have the benefit of it.

There being no objection, the paper was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Bureau of Education has five schools in Alaska north of the Arctic Circle.

Four of the schools can be reached with fuel, books, and other supplies but once a year, when for a few weeks the ice opens and allows the approach of vessels. The vessel that carries these annual supplies and the mail usually sails from Seattle in May.

The fund provided by Congress for schools and reindeer in Alaska for the year ending June 30, 1906, will be exhausted when present liabilities are met. The appropriation for native schools and reindeer (sundry civil bill) for the year ending June 30, 1907, has not yet been made and probably will not be in time to supply the arctic schools this year.

If the supplies and fuel are not sent at once, it will create much suffering and probably close the schools for a year.

While the educational and reindeer appropriations for the year ending June 30, 1906, are exhausted, there is a small unexpended balance in the "license fund for schools outside of incorporated towns." After outstanding liabilities against this fund are paid there will remain an available balance of $6,221.84.

If Congress will authorize the Secretary of the Interior to transfer this unexpended available balance of this fund (now under his control) from the "license fund for schools outside of incorporated towns" to the funds for "education of natives" and "reindeer fund," it will relieve the present emergency and save four important Government schools from being closed for a year.

There are three white men at Barrow, being Mr. Spriggs, the missionary; Mr. Derby, Government school-teacher, and Mr. Brower, in charge of a shore whaling station.

Last fall a whaling vessel and the supply ship were wrecked in the ice near Barrow and three white families have had to care for the seventeen wrecked sailors until relief reaches them next August.

A letter written last January (1906), just received (May, 1906), states that at that time (January, 1906) they were nearly out of provisions.

Before the relief can reach them they will be in great straits and probably living on whale blubber.

The supply vessel is all ready to sail whenever Congress authorizes the transfer of the license fund to the education and reindeer funds, which will enable the Secretary of the Interior to send supplies to the starving employees of the Bureau of Education.

It is an emergency case and should be rushed through at once.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CLAPP introduced a bill (S. 6166) for the relief of Edwin S. Hall; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. DRYDEN introduced a bill (S. 6167) to improve the channels along the New Jersey seacoast; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PERKINS introduced a bill (S. 6168) granting an increase of pension to Calvin Lambert; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ELKINS introduced a bill (S. 6169) to amend section 64 of the bankruptcy act; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also introduced a bill (S. 6170) granting an increase of pension to Jacob C. Shafer; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CULLOM introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 6171) granting an increase of pension to William P. Robbe (with an accompanying paper); and

A bill (S. 6172) granting a pension to James Phillips.

Mr. DANIEL introduced a bill (S. 6173) for the relief of Thomas B. Miller, legal heir of Milton R. Muzzy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BURKETT introduced a bill (S. 6174) for the relief of Eliza A. Polk; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

AMENDMENT TO RAILROAD RATE BILL.

Mr. MORGAN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. MALLORY submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $100,000 for preliminary work on a graving dock of concrete and granite at the Pensacola Navy-Yard, Fla., etc., intended to be proposed by him to the naval appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PENROSE submitted an amendment relative to the advancement on the retired list of the Navy of officers below the grade of rear-admiral, including those with the rank of commodore, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the naval appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $1,000 for paving Kalorama avenue from Columbia road to Nineteenth street extended, intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. B. F. BARNES, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts:

On May 14:

S. 3522. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the construction and maintenance of roads, the establishment and maintenance of schools, and the care and support of insane persons in the district of Alaska, and for other purposes," approved January 27, 1905; and

S. 5943. An act to authorize the Minnesota, Dakota, and Pacific Railway Company to construct a bridge across the Missouri River.

THE PANAMA CANAL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, and ordered to be printed:

The Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith copies of correspondence between the Secretary of War and myself on the subject of the purchase of two steel dredges for the Panama Canal.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 15, 1906.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed, and the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President, at the adjournment of the Senate last evening we were considering the amendment which had been proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] as amended by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. This amendment proposes to abolish the present Interstate Commerce Commission, to create a new body composed of nine men, to divide the United States into nine separate transportation or judicial districts, and to provide that each one of the Commission shall represent a district, and it then proposes to make the salary of the Commissioners $12,000 a year each.

My first objection, Mr. President, to the amendment as offered is that it abolishes the present efficient Interstate Commerce Commission. That Commission has had an experience that is valuable to the interests of the United States, and I fear that if this amendment should prevail the public would take it that the abolishment of that body of men is a rebuke to them for the efficient service they have rendered under the laws that exist and for the very able aid they have given to the House and the Senate in perfecting the bill which is now before us.

I am not personally acquainted, Mr. President, with all of the members of the Commission, but it was my good fortune for a time to serve in the House with Mr. Clements, of Georgia, who for many years has been an able, honest, and efficient member of the Commission. I do not know how the southern members may feel regarding the abolishment of the Commission and the turning of this man out of office, but for one I would deprecate such action.

Another member of the Commission was at one time, and for a long period, an honored member of this body, Mr. Cockrell, of Missouri. His long and able service here has demonstrated his ability and his efficiency, and the work he has done there has demonstrated the wisdom of the President in selecting him for that great office. He is a member I would dislike very much to see turned out of office under the circumstances proposed by the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts. The other members of the Commission who have served there have demonstrated their fitness and efficiency.

Then why should the Senator from Massachusetts seek to abolish that Commission and to turn these men out of office? If it is necessary to increase the number of the Commissioners, that could be done by an amendment. It seems to me Congress ought not to say to the country that these men, who year after year have made their recommendations in the interests of the people, and whose recommendations now are to be engrafted into a law, for that service to the Senate and to the House and the country they should be summarily turned out of office.

In the discussion of the question yesterday the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] used the expression I shall read. He said:

I would have him—

Speaking of the Commissioner—

a resident, and my amendment provides that he shall have been for two years an actual resident of the circuit from which he is appointed. I want no importations of favorites, or whoever they may be, into one of these judicial circuits. I want the member of the circuit to be to the manner born and carrying the confidence of the circuit which he represents.

Mr. President, either the Senator from Maine misconceives the entire policy of legislation regarding this subject or he seeks to change the entire policy of legislation relating to this great question. Heretofore in all of the legislation that we have had upon this subject we have had that body a national body. We have had it so organized that there has been no East and no West, no North and no South, but when the members of the Commission were selected and took their oath of office they represented equally all sections of our common country. I would deprecate stronger than any language that I can express here this morning to see this great policy that has prevailed and which has controlled the action of the Government of the United States for nearly twenty years changed by the amendment that is proposed by the two Senators from New England.

What will be the result, Mr. President, if the policy of the Senator from Maine should prevail upon a question of this kind? Instead of making the Commissioner a national character, instead of saying to him, "When you become a member of that great body you are to forget your sectionalism and become a national character," it would require of him that he is to represent one particular section and look after that in a guarded and careful manner over and above any other section of our common country.

Now, the second proposition would be that it would lead to bickerings and jealousy upon the Commission itself. You select, if you please, a man from the State of Georgia and say that he is to specially represent that section of the country, and he would forget the interests of Illinois or Wisconsin or Michigan; but if you select the same man as he has been selected for the Commission and say to him, "While you live in Georgia, you are a national character and you are supposed to look after the interests of Illinois or Wisconsin or Michigan as well as you do after the interests of Georgia," he would at once respond to a sentiment of that kind.

Mr. President, if this amendment should prevail, if these different districts should be formed and these men should be required to live for two years prior to their appointment, as proposed by the Senator from Maine, in the district, and then to represent that particular district, we can readily see that when they come to consider questions that involve the interests of the South or the West with the Middle West or the East these men would become partisans and would at once insist that their section should be taken care of regardless of the interest of any other section of our country.

It seems to me that no more pernicious amendment could be adopted than the one that is proposed by these Senators from New England. They are injecting sectionalism into this legislation, and they are making a sectional Commission out of a great body that should look to the interests of our entire country.

As a justification, Mr. President, for making these districts the Senator from Massachusetts likened them to the nine judicial circuits of the United States. He says that he would have them like the Supreme Court of the United States. There is no similarity between two such bodies. They represent different interests. There can be no likeness and no similarity depicted even by the ability or the ingenuity of the Senator from Massachusetts. The Supreme Court judges are not required to live in one particular district. The Senator from Massachusetts is mistaken if he believes——

Mr. LODGE. Of course I never made any such absurd statement as that.

Mr. HOPKINS. I am very glad to have the Senator disclaim it. I should like to have him go one step further and disclaim that there is any similarity between the proposed creation of a commission of this character and the Supreme Court of the United States.

Why did he refer to the nine circuits and about members living within the limits of the respective circuits if he did not attempt to convey to the Senate and to the country the idea that the composition of the Supreme Court of the United States is based upon such a principle?

To-day, Mr. President, three of those learned and distinguished men live in one of these judicial circuits, and if we are to believe rumor at all, when the next change comes in that great body, instead of taking a man from one of the circuits that is not represented, we shall have a justice taken from a circuit that now has three representatives upon that bench. And why is it? It is because when we come to select the men for these great offices we should look to the efficiency and ability rather than to any section from which they come.

So far as I am concerned, Mr. President, I care not from what section of our common country these Commissioners are selected. If the President of the United States believes, and the Senate concurs in that belief, that they all can be taken from the State of Massachusetts with better credit to the country than from any other section, I will approve it. If they can be taken from the State of New York under the same circumstances, my action would be the same. For one, after we have labored here months in the preparation of a bill of this character to give the people some relief for which there is a crying need, I do not want to destroy the efficiency of the bill by making the Commission a partisan commission, so that no harmonious work can be accomplished by them.

Again, Mr. President, I am opposed to the number that is proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts. For twenty years we have had a commission of five, and they have done their work well. The House has recommended a commission of seven. Speaking for myself, I would be unwilling to go beyond that number. I believe that the efficiency of this great Commission will not be improved by increasing the number. As an illustration, when the Canal Commission was formed there was a commission of seven provided for in the law. Experience has taught us and taught the Executive that it is too large a board, and recommendations have been made that instead of increasing the number it should be decreased.

What is true of that Commission is equally true of this one. When you get a commission of nine men, as proposed by the Senators from New England, you get a cumbrous body. You get a body that will be unable to agree upon the great transportation questions that will be presented to them. You will get men of such numbers and a body so cumbrous in character that the shippers will be unable to get the relief that Congress has proposed here shall be given.

If I were going to vote, and if my will were to prevail here, instead of adopting the seven that is proposed by the House I would cut the number down to the five we have under existing law, and I would permit the present Commission, who have labored so long and well in the interest of the people of the country to remain there until it is determined by experience that some one or more of those men could be improved upon by making a change. I do not believe we ought to make any change in the personnel of the present Commission.

Another thing, Mr. President, I do not approve of the sentiment that was advocated here by the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Massachusetts yesterday in increasing the salaries of these men. We can get able men for the salaries that are now paid, $7,500. We are running mad, Mr. President, on the increase of salaries of these various Federal officers. I believe that men who serve upon this board should have an ample salary, so as to properly pay them for the great services they render the country, but I deprecate the sentiment that would give them the salaries that are proposed in the amendment now before the Senate.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, the amendment now under consideration, offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], is modeled substantially on an amendment offered by me. The changes which have been made by the Senator from Massachusetts, in my judgment, improve the amendment. I therefore will not present to the Senate for consideration the amendment which I submitted, but will very cordially unite with the Senator from Massachusetts in supporting the amendment offered by him.

The changes made by the Senator from Massachusetts are, I think, only three in number. One of them provides that there shall be at least three lawyers on the Commission. I do not think it is within the limits of reasonable doubt but that any commission organized of this character, composed of nine men, would contain at least three lawyers.

Another change made in the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts increases the salary of the Commission. As the amendment was prepared by me the salary was fixed at $10,000. I incline to think that it will be wise to increase the salary to $12,000, because the duties and responsibilities of the Commission exceed any duties and responsibilities at any time heretofore imposed upon any commission under the Government. It is hard to estimate correctly the immense power which will be wielded by this Commission, the immense responsibility that will be imposed upon it, and the question of salary is a mere bagatelle, so we are sure to secure the very best talent, the very best learning, the very best effort that can be furnished in this country. So far as I am concerned, while I thought a salary of $10,000 a year adequate, I am very willing to see the members of the Commission paid $12,000 per annum.

The other change made in the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts changed somewhat the terms of service, and I think that that change is a benefit to the bill. But, Mr. President, the essential feature of this provision is the abolition of the present Commission, the increase of its numbers, and the distribution of the Commissioners to the several parts of the country.

I differ from what the Senator from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] has stated. I think the Commission ought to be abolished. I do not mean to say that the present members ought not to be reappointed, but I say that the duties and responsibilities of the position have been changed, and the President ought now, in the creation of a commission, to meet these new and enlarged responsibilities, and he ought to have a wider field of selection than the five men now serving on the present Commission. The President no doubt will appoint a number of the present Commissioners. In my judgment, he ought to reappoint a number of them. But I do not think his power of selection ought to be limited to these five. He ought to be permitted to get the very best talent in the United States. It is no attempt to srike at the Commission. It is the purpose of the amendment to give the President a wider field of selection, in order that he may secure the very best talent, whether now on the Commission or off of it.

Again, Mr. President, as to the distribution of the Commissioners, the Senator from Illinois argues that it will make a sectional Commission. I differ with him. A Commissioner who is appointed on the body from the State of Texas will represent the United States just as much as will a Commissioner appointed from the New England States. That they shall be distributed uniformly throughout the country is essential in order that, knowing the diversified interests of the country, justice may be done to every section of the country. I consider that of vital importance.

I regard the amendment now being discussed before the Senate as the most important amendment which has been proposed, and in the amendment I consider that the most important feature is that feature which compels the distribution of the Commissioners to the several parts of the country.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. MARTIN. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If the President is left free, does not the Senator from Virginia think he would take the whole country into consideration and every section thereof in appointing the Commissioners; and if that is true, why is it necessary for Congress to determine the limits within which he must appoint Commissioners?

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, on the present Commission I think the five members come from about one-sixth part of the territory of the United States. I do not want that to happen again. If I am not mistaken, two of them come from one State. I do not want to see that happen again. They may be and they are good men, but I am not one of those Senators who believe that you are bound to go to one section of the country to get good men. They may be excellent men, but just as good men can be found in other sections of the country.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the Senator permit me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. MARTIN. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. I desire to say to the Senator from Virginia that he is mistaken. There are no two Commissioners who come from the same State. The Senator may have in mind the fact that one Commissioner is a resident of Vermont and another of the State of New York, who are in the same judicial circuit that was spoken of by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. MARTIN. I stand corrected, Mr. President. I had in mind judicial circuits instead of States. It was my inaccuracy.

Mr. HOPKINS. I desire to say——

Mr. MARTIN. I do not want any two of them to come from the same judicial circuit any more than I want any two of them to come from the same State.

Mr. HOPKINS. I should like to ask the Senator from Virginia if he takes any exception to the ability or efficiency of either of those great men?

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I am not going to bring this discussion down to the level of an individual. This is a great public question, and I am not going to vote one way or the other in order to preserve the tenure of office of any man. Let the President of the United States have the broadest field of selection, and put on him the responsibility of selecting good men, but require him to find, as he can easily find, good men from the several sections of the country, and not get all of the good men from any one section.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield further to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. MARTIN. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Does the Senator know any reason why Congress should legislate men whom all agree to be good men out of office?

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I know no reason why when we change the duties and responsibilities of the Commission the President ought not to be limited in their selection. No man has any right to an office. If the President thinks they are good men and able men and are deserving of reappointment he can reappoint them. We do not take from him the power to continue good men in office.

Mr. HOPKINS. That is the point right there. If this amendment——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. MARTIN. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. If the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts should prevail, the President could not reappoint the two good men, because they live in the same circuit.

Mr. MARTIN. That is just why I am in favor of the amendment. It is to prevent him from doing that very thing. Equally good men can be found in other sections of the country.

Mr. HOPKINS. But the Senator has just said that he was willing that the President should appoint good men, regardless of where they came from, as I understood him.

Mr. MARTIN. The Senator misunderstood me very radically if he thought I wanted the President to appoint them regardless of where they came from, when I offered an amendment restricting him in that respect, and I have been trying to convince the Senate for the last five minutes that he ought to be restricted in that respect, because men as good as these can be found in other parts of the country. All the good men do not come from any one section, but you can find good men in every section of the country. I want to have the President limited in that respect and required to distribute these offices throughout the different sections of the country.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. MARTIN. For a question.

Mr. McCUMBER. It is a question. The Senator just now made the statement that he did not believe two men should be selected in one circuit. I wish to ask him if he has any objection to two men being selected from a circuit containing fourteen States and Territories, namely, Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri, Arkansas, Indian Territory, Oklahoma, Kansas, Nebraska, South Dakota, North Dakota, Wyoming, Colorado, Utah, and New Mexico? Does the Senator think that any great wrong would come to the country from selecting two from all that vast section, in which there are 66,000 miles of railway and 13,000,000 inhabitants?

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, wrong might not be done in that particular instance, but it is necessary to district the country for the purpose of appointing the Commissioners, and while the amendment provided that the distribution should be governed by the boundaries of the judicial circuits, that was done as a matter of convenience. The suggestion of the Senator from Texas that he would offer an amendment dividing the United States into transportation districts for the purpose of appointing these Commissioners is just as acceptable, and the Senator from Massachusetts indicated his purpose to accept that amendment.

I am not wedded to the particular division of the country here proposed. I would be very willing to see a new districting made if one can be made more fair and more just to all the different sections of the country. It was for convenience that I accepted the districting which exists in judicial circuits. I believe now it meets essentially the conditions we are trying to meet. I do not believe that any great injustice is done by taking the boundaries of the judicial circuits. It is true that we find two or three of them in the New England States, including New York and Pennsylvania, if you want to enlarge that description to include those States; but those populous States are entitled to great consideration, and I do not see that in taking the boundaries of the judicial circuits any great injustice is done to any section of the country. It is not an entirely perfect and equitable division; but it is so difficult to reach a division that is entirely equitable and satisfactory to everybody that I adopt this method of division.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator yield to me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. MARTIN. For a question?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes; for a question. I ask, if the Senator thinks it is good policy to legislate a commission out of office so that the President may have a free hand in reappointment in one instance, why does he not think it a good thing in other instances? If he thinks this Commission should be legislated out of office in order to give the President a free hand, why not legislate the Panama Canal Commission out of office, or why not legislate any other commission out of office in order to give the President a free hand? Why differentiate?

Mr. MARTIN. We have not time in fifteen minutes to discuss every sort of commission.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I think it would take the Senator fifteen hours to give a good reason for that.

Mr. MARTIN. If I had a little over fifteen minutes I should be perfectly willing to discuss that with the Senator from Indiana. A very strong argument might be made why this should be done. The Panama Canal Commission has not proved such a great success as to compel us to adopt the same rules that we have provided in regard to its members; and I have no doubt before Congress adjourns there will be some regulation of that matter.

But I have not needed to go outside the abstract consideration of this question to satisfy my mind. I believe this distribution of these commissioners into districts is essential and important. I consider it the most important question that has been before the Senate for its consideration.

How much time have I remaining of my fifteen minutes, Mr. President?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator has two minutes remaining.

Mr. MARTIN. Well, Mr. President, I shall hardly be able to take up any other thought in relation to this matter in so brief a period as two minutes, and so I will rest what I have to say upon this point.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, for a long time I favored the idea of taking the members of the Interstate Commerce Commission from the judicial circuits of the country. When the discussion of the rate question took place last winter, I believe something was said in the Senate about selecting members of the Commission from the judicial circuits while the hearings were going on last summer. I first favored the appointment of nine Commissioners, to be taken from the judicial circuits. I believe in the distribution of the Commission throughout the limits of the United States, if this can be done, but I hardly think that the division into circuits would meet that as well as the suggestion of the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], to make the appointments from transportation districts. In thinking over this matter, I have reached the conclusion that perhaps five members would be better than seven, and seven would be infinitely better than nine. I believe section 8 of the House bill on this subject is the best disposition of this question in all particulars, and I am willing to vote for it, with the addition of an amendment that the salary of the secretary of the Commission shall be increased in proportion to the increase of the salaries of the Commissioners. The salary of the Commissioners, under the House bill, is $10,000 a year. I believe each Commissioner has a messenger and a clerk, who accompany him. The Supreme Court judges receive $12,500 a year, the circuit judges only $7,000 a year, and the district judges only $6,000 a year. I can not believe that the rank of one of these Commissioners is greater or that the duties performed by him are more important, more exacting, and require more ability than the duties of a circuit judge. To give the Commissioners a larger salary seems to me, therefore, to be a discrimination against the circuit judges of the United States. In addition, the circuit judges have a wider and more extended jurisdiction, covering all kinds of complicated questions, and their pay is only $7,000 per annum.

I believe, too, that nine members of the Commission would be cumbrous, for the reason that the Commission is required to travel to all parts of the United States to look after the public interests, under the interstate-commerce laws. They can not always remain here in Washington. This is impossible. They will often have to go to Chicago, to Boston, to St. Louis; they will have to go to New York and other cities. Think of nine members of this Commission going from one State to another, with their clerks and messengers, if you please, attending to cases as they may arise.

It may be said that only four Commissioners ought to go and the others remain in Washington. Who is going to order the four to go and the others to remain? The members of the Commission are all of equal rank. There is a presiding officer, it is true, but the presiding officer can not designate members for a special service, three to go here or two to go there; he can not impose upon them any duty; he can not make any distinction. When the Commission moves, it must move as a body. When necessary, it must go to New York, for instance, and take testimony, unless there is an agreement otherwise, and when the Commission goes to a city rooms must be procured, places found, and the expenses will be materially increased.

I think, according to the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] yesterday, that perhaps for efficient service five members would better answer, but I am willing to agree to the provision contained in the House bill in section 8.

Mr. President, I am opposed to legislating men out of office who have large experience and a record for faithfulness and ability. I do not believe there has ever been any charge of any kind brought against any one of these Commissioners in the public press or elsewhere. They have devoted themselves with a singleness of purpose to the discharge of the most difficult and intricate duties which have been laid upon them. They have had to tread new paths not marked out heretofore in our jurisprudence; they have been obliged to take up and consider laws which have not been interpreted by the courts of the United States; they have had to meet them and to consider all of the difficult questions presented to them, most of them judicial in their nature. I think they have done well. They have settled in all, I believe, about 3,000 cases, about which the public know nothing. They act often as a commission of arbitration and reconciliation, and in two or three thousand cases they have reconciled differences between railroads and shippers to the satisfaction of both which were of importance and about which the public knows nothing. These are cases which do not attract public attention.

Mr. President, I think it would not work well practically to discharge or put out of office men who have given ten, twelve, and, I think, some of them fourteen years' time to understand their duties, men who have acquired experience which it would take years for new men to acquire.

We had better, I think, go slowly in this matter of putting out of office public servants who have done well, who know now their duties and can discharge them better than new men can. It takes a long time to fully understand and appreciate these great questions. It has taken the Senate three months' discussion to reach a conclusion about amendments to the present laws. We should not dispense with or put aside experienced men in great offices like these held by the Commission.

I am perfectly willing that the salary shall be $10,000 a year if that will enable us to secure better men. I would go further, and say that I think this is making a discrimination, as I have said before, against the circuit judges of the United States; and that I am unwilling to do. I think we can get men of the highest character and of great ability to fill these offices at a salary of $10,000 a year; that is what the House has provided in the pending bill, and retain in the public service men of established character, of large ability, and of great experience. The President, from time to time, can add to the number of the Commission if the bill passes, two at once; and, as vacancies occur, he can fill them with untried and new men.

For these reasons, Mr. President, I have reached the conclusion that we had better agree with the House provision in this regard, and not legislate the present Commission out of office.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question on this point?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. ELKINS. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Does not this point also strike the Senator: That whereas if we now have experienced men for a salary of $7,500, why pay $12,500 to men without experience?

Mr. ELKINS. That is true.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I agree with the part of the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] that provides for nine Commissioners, one of whom shall be president of the Commission. I may agree with him in various other parts of his amendment, but not all of them, and perhaps particularly that part in regard to the lawyers. I do not think any lawyer has got any business on that Commission. If he had named four Commissioners, I would insist that two of them should be lawyers of this body, or should at least agree with the lawyers of this body in the majority in favor of injunction or of the minority against injunction, so that we might have that question fought out in the Commission as well as in the Senate of the United States. It seems to me one of the great leading propositions in regard to railroad rate regulation in this country.

But, Mr. President, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts does not rest, in my judgment, upon a legitimate basis. The accidental arrangement or the convenient arrangement of the judicial circuits of the United States can have no reference in the world to commerce or trade or manufactures or transportation; and this bill has reference to all of these and to every interest of every person in the United States. The Commission that acts under this bill will be, and ought to be, if it is fairly constituted, a thoroughly representative body. It should represent all the industries of the United States that are transmitted in interstate commerce of every kind and character; it should represent all the producing sections and all the manufacturing sections of the United States, the mining sections, the grain-growing sections, the cotton-growing sections—it should represent all of these; but, above all, Mr. President, it ought to represent the maritime ports of the United States.

We have here a great center of production, in which is included every benefaction that Providence could bestow upon the human family, and in magnificent and unlimited abundance; and it is the transit of this production and overproduction of our country through the seaports to foreign countries from which we derive a large part, at least, of our actual national wealth.

There is a word that is of common use amongst gentlemen who descant upon railroad rates and the regulation of them that I have a very great dread about. It is the word "differentiation"—the differentiation in rates between the different ports of the States in this Union. The national railroad Commission have within their power the right to differentiate rates between the different ports of the United States. That is exactly in harmony with the bill; and, in fact, it has been frequently referred to here as one of the leading propositions in this measure. A railroad commission, with the power of differentiation between the sea on either side and between the Lakes on the north and the Gulf on the south in regard to the transmission of commerce created in the interior or elsewhere, is a very dangerous body of men, who possess powers of that sort, with no power given even to the courts to control their differentiation.

In order to provide against that more particularly, and in order to provide a system of representation throughout the United States of all of the great industries, and the small ones, too, in connection with interstate commerce, I think there ought to be some principles conserved, some ground of reason and logic connected with our geographical condition as well as our division into States and Territories, and so forth. I propose, Mr. President, an amendment which is based upon the proposition that every seaport in the United States, whether it is upon the lakes, upon the gulf, upon the Atlantic, or upon the Pacific, should have a representative on this board. I have divided the nine districts which I propose to create, so that six of them are maritime divisions and two of them are interior divisions, that relate to the great mass of the productions of the country. The distribution which I seek to make in this amendment is a fair and just one. It includes those States which are already prosperous, and already heavily settled, and those States which have a future that will equal, if it does not exceed, the population, progress, and wealth of the older States of the American Union. It is fair and just to all of them.

I will state that whatever disposition is made of this amendment to-day—I have not had an opportunity to offer it sooner, and to get it printed in the ordinary form—but whatever disposition is made of it to-day, unless it should be adopted, I will take occasion to call attention to it again in the Senate, after the bill goes into that body, so that Senators may have an opportunity of studying its merits. If it has not merits, I do not want it to be adopted; if it has merits, I think it is a matter that will concern every Senator on this floor.

I ask the Secretary to read the proposed amendment. Can I have it read without taking it out of my time, Mr. President?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama.

The SECRETARY. On line 4 of Mr. LODGE'S amendment it is proposed to strike out all after the words "Interstate Commerce Commission," down to and including the word "circuit," in line 8, and to insert the following:

Nine commissioners shall be appointed by the President under the provisions of this act, by and with the consent of the Senate. They shall be natives and citizens of the United States and shall have resided for a period of not less than two years in the State from which they are appointed.

Six maritime districts and two interior districts are hereby constituted, from each of which one of said commissioners shall be appointed, but not more than one commissioner shall be appointed from the same State.

The eight districts shall comprise the following-named States:

The first district shall consist of the States east of the Mississippi River that border on the Great Lakes of the north or on the Dominion of Canada and shall include the State of Maine;

The second district shall include the States south of the State of Maine that border on the Atlantic Ocean to the southern boundary of Maryland;

The third district shall include the States that border on the Atlantic Ocean south of Maryland, except the State of Florida;

The fourth district shall include the States that border on the Gulf of Mexico, including Florida;

The fifth district shall include Oregon and California;

The sixth district shall include the States that border on the Pacific Ocean and on the British possessions as far to the east as Minnesota;

The seventh district shall include the interior States not included in the sixth district that are west of the Mississippi River; and

The eighth district shall include the interior States that are east of the Mississippi River and are not included in another district.

The President shall appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a president of the said commission, who shall be chosen from any State in the American Union from which no other commissioner has been appointed. A vice-president shall be chosen by the commission to perform the duties of president in case of a vacancy in the office of president, or in case of his absence from the United States, or of his disability, until a successor is duly appointed and qualified.

Mr. MORGAN. Now, Mr. President, the Senate has got a view of the nine districts I propose in respect of the appointment of the Commission. Six of them are distributed around the seaboard of the United States, touching every point on it where a vessel from abroad can engage in commerce with our people. Two of them are interior districts from the States that are not included in the maritime districts, and the ninth district is the entire Union, from which the President of the United States appoints the president of the Commission. That is enough for me to say just now as to the geographical disposition of this subject.

I think all Senators will see that the plan I propose is just to every part of the Union and that it will prevent that calamity to which I look forward with greater apprehension than any other connected with the passage of this bill—this power that I have named of differentiation between the ports of the different States by a commission who shall be assembled from a certain part of the Union.

Take the great manufacturing centers, the great commercial centers, and the great cities that they represent and appoint your commission from the surrounding country and let them go to differentiation, and there will be complaint against this bill that will destroy it in the first session after it has been enacted; there will be practices that will be complained of, whether justly or not, in respect to differentiation by the Commissioners.

The Senator from Massachusetts has overcome that difficulty. As I say, he had it in his mind when he adopted the programme of judicial districts as the basis of his amendment. His amendment and mine are alike exactly, except in respect to the method of distribution of the districts for making the appointments.

I do not know, Mr. President, that it is worth while to attempt to argue a proposition which, when stated, carries a conclusive effect upon its face of justice and propriety and safety to all the different interests of the United States.

I lament the fact that I did not have the opportunity yesterday evening to have the amendment put in print so that I could have it considered by the Senate. The most that I can do now is to submit it to the Senate and let the Senate pass upon it. If it is voted down, of course I will present it again in the Senate when the bill is open for consideration.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. MORGAN. For a question, yes.

Mr. HALE. I thought the Senator was through.

Mr. MORGAN. No.

Mr. HALE. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. MORGAN. Some apprehension is felt in this body, Mr. President, in regard to the political complexion of the members of this great Commission. It would never have occurred to me that it was proper or necessary to put any such qualification in the bill, but others seem to think differently, and, as we have done on many occasions here—I think with impropriety on every occasion—the political affiliations of the appointees under a measure are distributed between the two great leading parties of the United States.

This bill provides that not more than five of the nine Commissioners shall belong to one political party. It is almost impossible to look over the South and to state the character of the men in the South who are fit for such a position as this without discovering the fact that their politics would rule them out, perhaps, in a very large degree from participation in the work of this Commission. Of the four Democrats who are to be chosen, they would either all come from the South or at most we might get two of them. That suggests to me a difficulty in the execution of this law which may have a very ill effect upon its success as a great legislative measure. I can say this, Mr. President, that there are Democrats, and Democrats of ability, in the South who are so deodorized that the President perhaps would have no difficulty in finding some way of appointing them to office, and I am willing to put up with that class of Democrats rather than not to get the matter through. So that I will not object on that ground to this bill. I think it is really an improper provision, but I do not propose to criticise it or to object to it. Neither do I find any objection to any other of the provisions of the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts. I have not introduced my amendment with a view of combating any other provisions in his amendment; I merely ask to strike out in line 4 of that amendment the words:

> Said Commission shall consist of nine members, one for and from each judicial circuit of the United States, who shall have been for two years immediately preceding his appointment an actual resident in such circuit.

I move to strike out those words and to insert my amendment in lieu of them. I also ask that my amendment be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from Alabama will be printed, as requested.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I wish to take this occasion to voice a sentiment against this attempt, surreptitious in its effect at least, to select a few of the Federal officers of a certain grade and to grant them excessive remuneration as compared with other Federal officers doing a like character of work.

I for one, Mr. President, am in favor of a readjustment of all the salaries of Federal officers, from top to bottom. The time has arrived when that ought to be done, but it ought to be done systematically, and with a view, as far as possible, of eliminating the inequalities in the pay of the several branches of the Federal service throughout the country.

What I do not like is the system that is growing here to create commissions; and every time we create a commission we give them a salary two or three times above that which is given to other officers of equal grade at least and who fill Federal places requiring at least equal intelligence, ability, and integrity. I would ask the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who time and again upon this floor has declaimed in favor of the personnel of the circuit bench of the United States, who has spoken so highly of them and declared that they were the very best men in the country and could scarcely be improved upon, how it is that we can secure such men as they are for $7,000 per annum, and yet, at the same time, we can not secure proper men for positions on the commission proposed to be created without immediately providing salaries of twelve thousand and twelve thousand five hundred dollars per annum?

The Senator says he wants not only intellectual men, men of ability, but he wants to add a dignity to the Commission. Therefore, assuming that our circuit court judges are men of ordinary ability, and that six or seven thousand dollars is sufficient for them, the Senator then would pay seven thousand dollars for the service and six thousand or five thousand dollars for the dignity of the particular persons who are to be selected for these official positions.

Mr. President, I deny that we can not fill these offices without paying such excessive salaries. It has been declared over and over again that in order to properly conduct such a project as the Panama Canal it is necessary to get the very highest paid men, and then, instead of taking the average pay of men of that character throughout the United States, you select simply the salaries that are paid by a few of the great corporations which can afford to pay enormous salaries. We said we could not get the proper engineers at less than forty or fifty thousand dollars a year, and so we select engineers at the rate of twenty-five and thirty thousand dollars. We selected one engineer who went to work there and dug out a large portion for this canal, and we were paying him $30,000 or $25,000 a year for his services. Immediately another one of your $30,000 engineers came in and declared that not only had the dirt been removed where it was not necessary to remove it, but that the refuse was placed where it would have to be moved again. So we find this great disagreement among those $30,000 men, and I submit to the Senate we can get just as bad work as that done at a great deal less expense.

Mr. MORGAN. In justice to the engineers who have been alluded to, I desire to say that the Committee on Interoceanic Canals have gone into a full investigation, and that it is quite an incorrect statement to say that any earth has been dumped at any place on the canal where it will have to be removed.

Mr. McCUMBER. I simply have the testimony of one of the men on the Commission, which was taken here and read in the Senate, in which it was declared that the removal was from a place where it was unnecessary to remove it, and that it would have to be removed from the place where it had been dumped. I can not give the names at this time, but I believe Shonts was the one testifying, and he had reference to the work done by Wallace.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator name that Commissioner?

Mr. McCUMBER. Wallace.

Mr. MORGAN. Wallace?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator is entirely mistaken.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am not mistaken.

Mr. MORGAN. Wallace made no such statement.

Mr. McCUMBER. If I had the record, I could follow this up. I remember distinctly what I read.

Mr. MORGAN. You had better look it up in the record.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think there are other Senators who will concur with me in that proposition.

The intellectuality of one individual is not so much superior to the average that his services are worth five and ten times the amount of the average pay. We want on this Commission, first, good, honest men. We want conscientious men, and, then, above all, we want workers. I would care more for a man who could work sixteen hours a day and work hard than I would for the most brilliant one that could be selected in the United States. For after all it is labor that is going to count. It does not require such brilliancy as it does good, common sense and a conscientious spirit in doing the work. No man can go on this Commission and be prepared immediately to go on with the work. It will require a year or so of hard labor before he is able to do the work properly. I think no one will doubt that.

Mr. President, if we shall proceed on the basis of the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts, that you are always going to secure greater intellectuality in proportion to the amount you pay, then we ought to pay fifty or a hundred thousand dollars. But what I submit is that we will get just as good men by paying a reasonable price. What is that price? The Government should never be penurious in the payment for services rendered the Government. It should always be liberal. It should pay an amount sufficient to enable the person who goes into its employment to support himself and family respectably in the place to which he is assigned. If it goes under that, it is penurious. If it goes above that, then it is doing injustice to all of the other Federal officers who are compelled to labor in similar positions for less compensation.

We have in this body an ex-Attorney-General, a man who perhaps, in his own home and in his own practice could earn fifty or a hundred or three hundred thousand dollars a year. I do not know what his income might be; but I know that we have as good lawyers in the Senate to-day as there are in the United States, and they are serving for a salary of $5,000 per annum. Many lawyers, when they left their own practice for Government employ, were satisfied to accept an amount not more than a quarter of what they might earn in their own private practice. There is honor in the position. There is a desire on the part of men to work in the public service, not only for the good that they can do to humanity, but also with the assurance that the little perplexities, the continual contest incident to the struggle for existence in life are to a great extent laid aside, and the mind can be given directly to its work rather than to a great extent in securing remuneration for services performed. That is a reason itself. That is one reason why we get men who can earn $50,000 a year and place them on the Federal bench at $7,000 per annum.

It seems to me it is absolutely unjust, so long as we are paying to our Cabinet officers $8,000, to place the salary of one of these Commissioners at $12,000. Does it not require just as great ability to occupy the position of Secretary of State as it does to be upon this Commission? Are not the things to be considered by him as important to the country? Does it not require four times as much labor to fill the position of Secretary of the Interior, looking after not only the details, but generally after all matters of the interior interests throughout the United States, as it does to be a member of this Commission? And yet the Secretary of the Interior gets but $8,000.

Mr. President, I want to say that for one I will not vote to raise any salary above what is the usual amount paid by the Government of the United States for services of like character until we reach that point where we may have a readjustment and place them all exactly where they belong. I want to protest against this systematic attempt to select a few favored commissions and pay the commissioners salaries two or three times above what is paid for equal service throughout other sections of the country.

Mr. President, it seems to me upon the other proposition we could reach it by a simple amendment, that in selecting the Commissioners they should be appointed by the President so that all sections of the country, as nearly as possible, should be represented by the personnel of the Commission. The President would understand what that meant. He would be at liberty to make his selections where he thought best, and I am certain that so far as possible each great section of the United States would be properly represented. When the proper time comes I shall move, although the proposition may have but one vote in the Senate, that the salary of the Commissioners shall be just exactly what they have been serving for for the last ten or twelve years—$7,500.

Mr. McCREARY. Mr. President, I am not in favor of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. I do not think there is any necessity for increasing the number of Interstate Commerce Commissioners to nine. While we should have honest, able, and industrious Commissioners, the number should not be too great. According to my observation a large number of Commissioners generally do not work so well together as a smaller number. I am not in favor of increasing the salary of each Commissioner to $12,000 per annum, as proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts in his amendment. The work of the Commission will be increased in the future; the effect of the pending bill will be to give to the Commission more work and more responsibility than they have had heretofore, and I am in favor of increasing the salary; but I do not believe the salary should be increased to more than $10,000 per annum. We pay our heads of Departments only $8,000. We pay our judges of the Supreme Court $12,500. I see no reason why we should increase the salary of the Interstate Commerce Commissioners from $7,500, which I believe is the amount now allowed them per annum, to more than $10,000.

I am in favor, Mr. President, of that part of the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts which preserves this, as it is now, as a nonpolitical Commission. The members of the Interstate Commerce Commission should be chosen from both parties. There should be nothing to indicate that it is a political Commission.

I am heartily in favor of the legislation to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission. We see what great questions the Interstate Commerce Commissioners will have to deal with when we remember that the Interstate Commerce Committee was engaged for nearly a year in taking evidence, and we have been debating questions relating to the regulation of railroad rates here for nearly four months.

We need good men for the position of Commissioners. They should be men who are honest, who are able, who are industrious, who are independent, who will do their duty no matter what obstacles are thrown in the way. I am in favor, after this bill is passed, of the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appointing a commission to take the place of the present Interstate Commerce Commission. I admire the present members of the Commission. I believe we have at the present time able men, good lawyers, honest men, men worthy of the positions they hold; and if the President of the United States regards them as in every respect suitable, they can be reappointed. There will be nothing in the bill to prevent their reappointment.

But I am not in favor of appointing nine. I am in favor of appointing seven, the number prescribed in the bill which passed the House. I think seven Commissioners are enough, and I think when they are allowed $10,000 per annum the salary is sufficient. I am not in favor of having only one Commissioner from the South, as we had for many years. I have heard in this debate that there are two from one United States judicial circuit. I am not in favor of appointing nine Commissioners from nine United States judicial circuits. I do not believe that is the proper way to select them. But I am in favor of the appointment of seven, and they should be as nearly as possible selected from the various geographical sections of our country.

A suggestion made yesterday by the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], that they be appointed after dividing the United States into seven transportation districts, is very good, and I hope that he has examined that question and will be able to present us seven transportation districts fairly and justly laid out and described.

Mr. President, I regard the section of the bill relating to the appointment of Commissioners as one of the most important sections of the bill. If we have a good law—and I believe we have improved the bill that came to us from the House, and I hope and believe when we get through we will have a good law, certainly a good law as a start; nothing is ever perfect in the beginning; I believe when we get through with it we will have passed a bill that will be a good start toward the accomplishment of what we desire—if we have a good law, unless we have the right kind of Commissioners to carry out the law we can not expect it to be a success.

I hope and believe the President of the United States, when he comes to select the seven, if that shall be the number, and I hope it will be, will give us able men, industrious men, brave men, honest men, and that they will discharge their duties fearlessly, and that the country will be pleased with the law they are executing.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, the bill before us as it came from the House received the consideration of the Senate committee for some four or five months or longer, I think. At all events, five large volumes of testimony have been presented to us for our consideration, which none of us or very few of us have read or digested. That committee has not seen proper to report any amendment to this section of the bill.

Mr. LODGE. To what section of the bill, if the Senator will allow me, did the committee think it proper to make amendments?

Mr. PERKINS. I can not speak for the committee.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator knows very well that the committee reported no amendment to any section.

Mr. PERKINS. I merely speak of the bill as it is before us for consideration. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] has not been backward in presenting amendments.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator knows very well that the committee did not report amendments to any section.

Mr. PERKINS. Admitting that, experience has demonstrated that a committee of five has done very excellent work. A commission of seven, it seems to me, judging from my business experience in companies, would be quite ample to perform the duties devolved upon the Interstate Commerce Commission. The House has fixed the salary at $10,000 per annum, with all their traveling expenses, incidental expenses, and those of their secretaries, clerks, and messengers, who accompany them while the Commission is sitting to hear testimony in cities other than the capital. I am willing to accept their recommendation. If the Representatives think that the salary of the Commissioners should be twice that of a Member of the House of Representatives, that it should be $10,000 per annum, that it should be $3,000 more per annum than that of a circuit judge of the United States, well and good; I am willing to vote for the section of the bill as it is presented to us from the House, and as it comes to the Senate from the committee.

I want to say in passing, though, that I do not believe the payment of a $10,000 salary or a $20,000 salary will get us any more capable or any more honorable Commissioners than those we have at present, or those who will accept appointment under this bill. I have lived long enough to realize the fact that telltale money drawers and bell punches do not make honest men. There must be a higher motive actuating men in the performance of their duties than a physical monitor upon their actions. It must be their own conscience which prompts them to do that which they believe to be just and right. If we have the approval of our own conscience, there is nothing to reproach ourselves with even if we make mistakes in our official life.

The only defect in this section which I should like to see remedied is with respect to the distribution of the Commissioners. Perhaps it can be remedied, in accordance with the suggestion of the Senator from North Dakota, by adding that all geographical sections of the country shall be represented in the selection of the seven Commissioners, or it may be done by dividing the country into seven transportation districts on an equitable mileage or population basis in those districts.

What I am particularly desirous of seeing done in this bill is that we in the West—and I define the West in this instance as the country west of the Missouri River—may have one member on the Interstate Commerce Commission. Since it was established in 1887 we have been struggling and striving by our recommendations and indorsements to secure the appointment of a Commissioner from west of the Missouri River. We come from the great Pacific coast, reaching from San Diego to Point Barrow, certainly from San Diego to Puget Sound, in which territory there are many thousands of miles of railroad. Conditions there are so different from what they are on the Atlantic coast, with mountains and low valleys, that it is necessary that a Commissioner should be familiar with the geographical conditions there existing.

We succeeded only a few weeks since in prevailing upon the appointing power to select a Commissioner from west of the Missouri River. The committee to which the nomination was referred believed the spirit, if not the letter, of the interstate-commerce act had been violated, and so the nomination has not been reported to the Senate, and we have no Commissioner. Therefore I want to see this bill so amended that the Western States of this country, certainly those west of the Missouri River, may have one member on the Interstate Commerce Commission. A friend informs me that ex-Senator Cockrell comes from west of the Missouri River because he comes from Missouri. Kansas City is in Missouri, although it is very near Kansas. No one has more admiration or respect for ex-Senator Cockrell than I have. I was associated with him for some ten or twelve years upon the Appropriations Committee of the Senate, and I never met a more high-minded or conscientious man in the performance of his duties. He came to California, or started there once. He says he will go some time, and when he does he will be a Commissioner for California. Indeed, I think California would recommend him as her Commissioner.

I believe the proviso in the original act that no more than three members of any political party shall be eligible to appointment on the Commission is a wise one. If the Commission is to consist of seven members, I believe the same proviso should prevail—that not more than four of those members should belong to the same political party. The same law prevails in the case of the United States appraisers.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PERKINS. With pleasure.

Mr. HALE. Is not the present Commission made up of all lawyers?

Mr. PERKINS. Well, I know some lawyers who are very excellent gentlemen, and very able men, and very honest men.

Mr. HALE. So do I.

Mr. PERKINS. And I would be willing to leave my case to them—for instance, to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. I am not on the Commission.

Mr. PERKINS. No; the Senator would not accept the appointment.

Mr. HALE. There has been some talk about lawyers, and I want to bring out from the Senator the fact, as I understand it to be, that the present Commission is made up of all lawyers.

Mr. PERKINS. Judging from our experience in the Senate, it is difficult for lawyers to agree, for I do not think any half dozen of them have agreed on any proposition we have had pending before us here. I am frank to confess that if I were on the Commission I should like very much to have the counsel and advice of as good and as able a lawyer as my friend the Senator from Maine. But it does not necessarily follow that I would take it. But I like to hear what he has to say, for he always has something interesting to say. He reasons well, but, then, in many opinions of our judges the conclusions are quite different from the reasoning.

Mr. President, I think, with the Senator from Maine, that there should be some practical men upon the railroad Commission. I have in mind a gentleman whom I have known for over thirty years, who started as a clerk in a railroad office at seventy-five or a hundred dollars a month. To-day he is the leading railroad traffic manager in the United States. After thirty-odd years' experience he has acquired a knowledge of railroad traffic which makes him invaluable to the company employing him, and the salary he is paid is three times that which we propose to pay to these Commissioners. As I say, I think the suggestion of the Senator from Maine is excellent, that there should be some practical men upon the Commission. By that I mean men of experience in the transportation business. I myself followed it some thirty years, and I realize that I know very little about it. The magic of the different transportation tariffs would puzzle even the best player of chess that we have in this city or elsewhere. The different classifications of goods and the doubling of those rates and the different technical instructions that are given to the subordinate clerks to carry out would mystify almost anyone not familiar with the transportation business.

So I hope, Mr. President, that this section of the bill as it comes from the House will be, in the main, accepted and presented to us. With this increase of the number above seven, if we think we can get better service by paying $10,000 or $12,000 per annum, we should do it. An associate justice of the Supreme Court receives only $12,500 per annum. The Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and all the other Cabinet officers receive only $8,000 per annum. A United States circuit judge receives $7,000 per annum, and a United States district judge $6,000 per annum. Yet no one of these gentlemen could seek the appointment, or would be eligible to it, without devoting many years to the study and the practice of the profession which they honor by being placed in a judicial position.

I want to reiterate, Mr. President, that I believe this section should stand, in the main, as it is. Let us amend it so that the President may feel that he is instructed by Congress to recognize the different geographical sections of our country in selecting the Commissioners for this great and important trust.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] asks me in that tempestuous way which characterizes him [laughter] whether I have not already spoken once upon this amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The record shows that the Senator from Maine spoke upon the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, but he has not spoken on the amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia to that amendment.

Mr. HALE. I knew that very well, Mr. President, else I should not have risen.

Against the Interstate Commerce Commission I have no prejudice, and its work I recognize, as it has been getting in its work overnight. Not long hereafter, some time during the day, the Senate will be met with the question whether it proposes to enlarge the scope of the Interstate Commerce Commission and make its constitution commensurate with its importance. I have only the expectation of making the Senate in anything that I say look at the real issue.

The amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts as amended at my suggestion is not, as it has been attempted here, to make a New England or an eastern movement. If Senators do not see that, they do not see the real situation. New England and New York, which under any new arrangement or any recasting of transportation districts would come into one district, as they ought, have already two members of the Commission out of five, and neither Massachusetts nor Maine, nor New England generally speaking, is in any way dissatisfied with that apportionment, so far as numbers or persons go.

Nor is this a question of maintaining the discrepancy of judicial circuits, which is very patent indeed, and is only to be accounted for in the discrepancy between the different districts as to population, extent, and business, by the fact that when these circuits were created there was but little either of population or business beyond even the Mississippi River, not to say the Missouri. All that has changed.

Neither the Senator from Massachusetts, nor I, nor anyone who is in favor of recasting the districts for a moment want to adhere to the old judicial circuits. The moment the Senator from Texas arose in his place and suggested to me that a better way would be to provide for nine transportation districts, marking their great geographical outlines conforming to the population, business, and railroad employment, I stated frankly to him I had not thought of that, but believed it would be a good emergence; and the Senator from Massachusetts, who reported the original amendment, at once indicated not only his willingness, but his desire for it.

Now, when Senators come to that, they will be confronted with the issue raised here by the present Commission of leaving it undisturbed or of extending it so that it shall ramify in its personnel into every part of the country. Are Senators from these great outlying districts, which are not represented now, and which comprehend more than one-half of the population and business of the United States, content not to be represented on this Commission? Do Senators really believe what has been suggested by one or two Senators, that we could afford to leave this entirely to the President and let him select if necessary all of the Commissioners from one State or three States? I do not believe when the Senate is confronted with that question it will agree to keep the present situation as it is, and oblige us to keep all of the present Commissioners, maintaining that organization with only a little addition. I do not believe the Senate is going to accept that proposition when the Senate understands all that is sought to be accomplished by this amendment. There will be an amendment offered that will cover the idea of a division into transportation districts. I do not think then the Senate will be prepared to say that it will go no further.

When these districts are created, as they ought to be, and when we provide such compensation as shall secure the strongest men upon the Commission, then in appointing them, if the President believes the members of the present Commission are the best men, he will appoint them, provided they have their residence in the transportation districts as laid out, if the appointment is subject to that limitation.

Now, Senators have got to decide. As I said, the Interstate Commerce Commission has got its work in. It may have a majority in this body. Let me tell Senators what will happen if the present Commission, without meaning to reflect upon them, is to be practically the entire part of this Commission. There will be the same feeling of uneasiness, the same disposition to appeal, the same disposition to carry cases forward, so that at last the court shall be the rate fixer. This feeling and disposition will not be ended, but will be increased; and the country will find the condition which exists now of dissatisfaction with the Commission increased, and the opportunities that are given in the present bill of allowing parties to get to the courts will be taken advantage of at once more than now.

On the other hand, as I tried to show and to explain yesterday, if you will let this be a great commission, representing every part of the country, with great, strong men upon it, you will have a commission from which there will be but few appeals; the courts will not be the rate-making power. But if you keep the Commission as it is, the Commission will not be the rate-making power; cases will go by appeal and will be presented under the statute, as we have framed it, to the courts, where they ought not to go. We ought to have so great a tribunal, Mr. President, that men will think twice, the companies will think twice, the lawyers will think twice, everybody will think, before undertaking to disturb the conclusions of this great Commission.

I protest against the attempt which has been made to show or to claim that this is an eastern project, a New England project, a Massachusetts project, a Maine project. It is precisely the reverse. I want to see this power distributed. I want to see transportation districts established as they will be if the Senate does not decide that the present Commission shall stand. I want to see transportation districts established commensurate in size with their importance, and men appointed commensurate in ability with the importance of their work; and then we will be rid of this question. But Senators have got to confront in their votes the question whether they will leave things as they are or will go into this other, not only extended, but, as I believe, better domain of legislation.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. President, I appreciate as fully as anyone can, the value attaching to the extended debate which has been had upon this measure, nor am I lacking in a full measure of appreciation of the ability which has been displayed on all sides in the discussion of the new, novel legal questions that have been involved. But I feel warranted in saying that the amendment now pending, coming as it does from New England, from the Senator from Massachusetts, as amended by the Senator from Maine, in my judgment strikes the practical valuable features of this measure. I wish to take occasion now to express my appreciation of the fairness, the breadth of view, the utter lack of sectionality, that is embodied in the amendment now before the Senate. The Senator from Maine is fully justified in repudiating any suggestion of its being circumscribed by geographical consideration.

Upon the contrary, sir, the great sections of the West and the South are not fairly represented upon the Commission as it stands to-day, nor will they be fairly represented until some proposition such as the pending amendment shall be incorporated into the bill. I never have seen in my somewhat extended observance of legislation, a more unselfish, a broader, fairer, more admirable proposition than the one offered to the Senate by these two New England Senators now.

As to the increase of membership upon the Commission, I differ from the conclusion expressed by some here this morning. It seems to me that there is a pressing necessity for the increase in membership of the Commission. We know that to-day a part of the Commission are taking testimony in the western city of Chicago and have been for weeks. We know that this is continuously happening. We know that the Interstate Commerce Commission, during all the years of its existence, has been acting like a committee, through subcommittees, in different sections of our vast territory, and that there is not for any considerable length of time throughout the year more than a nucleus here at the capital of the five Commissioners. The subcommittees, just as the one employed to-day at Chicago, are scattered, taking testimony upon complaints filed in all the different States of this great Union.

I believe the Senator from Maine has contributed very largely by the suggestions he has submitted here as to the character of the Commission. I agree with him, further, in the conclusion that just as you shall select and constitute the Commission, you will decrease the present tendency to appeal from its findings. I believe with the Senator from Maine that if you will build up a commission of men whose capacity, whose character, whose ability inspire confidence and command the respect of the American people, you will see a rapid dwindling of the appeals from its findings to the courts of law. I believe that that is the best practical way to do away with the friction of which complaint is so generally and so justly made.

I do not think that you can go too far in stating the importance of furnishing to the country in this Commission, when it shall be constructed under the provisions of this act, a body of men in whom the public will repose as full a measure of confidence as they do in that of any judicial tribunal in this land. What boots it, then, to the carrier to appeal? Is he likely to prosecute that appeal when he knows he is going to a tribunal that is not possessed of any more ability, of any greater sense of fairness, of any more character than the one to whose findings he is objecting? The motive for an appeal is removed.

What we want, I take it, Mr. President, in the enactment of this measure is, if it be possible, to make such a law that in its operation and its application it will do away with the necessity of appeals altogether.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Certainly.

Mr. FOSTER. In what respect have the duties or labors of the Commission been so enlarged by the pending bill as to justify an increase of nearly double the membership?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not understand that the bill contemplates doubling the membership of the Commission.

Mr. FOSTER. The amendment proposes to increase the number from five to nine.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Upon the contrary, I think the answer to the question of the Senator from Louisiana is found in two directions. The bill confers in express terms upon the Commission the power to fix rates. That certainly is a power that has not been exercised by the Commission for the last eight years. That surely will increase the burden of labor that rests upon the Commission.

But that answer is not necessary, I apprehend, to justify the amendment proposed. It is found in the fact that the labors of the Commission must in the very nature of things keep pace with the development, the growth, and the expansion of business in this country.

I have not advocated the increase of salary to the extent proposed in this amendment, nor do I know that it is necessary. But upon that point, I will suggest that it is the easiest matter possible to draw contrasts such as the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] indulged in a little while ago when he spoke of the proposed salary as enlarged by the amendment being altogether out of proportion to that paid to Senators and Representatives in Congress and to Cabinet officers.

It is just as easy, Mr. President, for us to make these glaring contrasts apparent if we undertake to compare existing salaries, for surely there is no Senator who will claim that the salaries of the public officials to-day are based upon any consistent, logical, common-sense, or defensible theory. As long as the Clerk of the House and the Secretary of the Senate, or the Sergeant-at-Arms of either one, is paid more salary than a Senator or a Representative is it necessary to go further in order to sustain the assertion that there is no consistency, no logic, no defensibility in salaries existing now?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, would not his suggestion warrant a suggestion on my part that a bill I introduced two years ago, and reintroduced at the present session, which is now pending before a committee of the Senate, proposing a reasonable increase in the salaries of members of this body and the House of Representatives, ought to receive favorable consideration?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I answer very cheerfully and in the affirmative. I go further in that direction, Mr. President. I do not believe there is a man borne upon the pay rolls of the United States Government, whether he be Supreme Court justice or what not, saving and except the single representative of the executive branch of the Government, whose pay should be one penny more than the pay of a United States Senator or a Member of the House of Representatives. It is impossible, in my judgment, to conceive of a pay roll more inconsistent, more illogical, more indefensible, than the one we are carrying to-day.

The amendment pending here is equally acceptable to me, whether the salary stays at $7,500, $10,000, or $12,000, for I indorse, I repeat, the utterance of the Senator from Maine, delivered here yesterday, when I say that, in my judgment, the salary we are to pay to the men who are to constitute the Commission, if it shall be constructed as it ought to be, if it shall be builded out of the material it ought to be builded from, is a mere bagatelle in the consideration of this amendment.

I shall cheerfully vote for the amendment.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I have had some difficulty in reaching a conclusion regarding this matter. As to the question of salaries, I quite agree with the Senator from Massachusetts that the salaries should be increased, and if that issue alone were to be presented, I would vote in the affirmative.

As to the number of the Commission, my inclination has been rather to increase the number than to maintain its present status. But, upon reflection, I have come to the conclusion that the bill will simplify the duties of the Interstate Commerce Commission instead of enlarging them. Under present conditions the Interstate Commerce Commission is called upon to make the same inquiries that are instituted by this bill. The difficulty has been the lack of power in the Commission to enforce its orders. Under the pending bill the Commission has positive powers. It is no longer compelled to take the initiative against the carriers in the courts to enforce its orders. It will be on the defensive rather than on the offensive, as heretofore.

I think, therefore, that with the added powers the duties of that Commission can be performed with less waste of time than in the past.

A SMALL COMMISSION BETTER THAN A LARGE ONE.

So far as their deliberations are concerned, I am inclined to think that the smaller the Commission the better; that a commission of five sitting in deliberation upon a particular question involving matters of fact and of law can come to a conclusion more easily and more quickly than a commission of seven or a commission of nine.

But it is suggested that the Commissioners are engaged in taking testimony in different parts of the country. I believe it is the custom to assign to a particular Commissioner or a few Commissioners the duty of taking testimony with reference to a particular complaint. The result is that where sessions are held as a matter of convenience in different parts of the country the Commission is necessarily divided. I can conceive it quite possible that at least eight out of the nine commissioners might at any time be absent from Washington, each pursuing a separate inquiry in a different section of the country.

As a matter of convenience in taking testimony it is possible that the increase in the number of Commissioners may expedite the taking of testimony, but I apprehend that in each case the entire Commission sits in judgment; that the testimony is reported to the entire Commission, and so they sit in deliberation and judgment. I do not know whether existing legislation provides for taking testimony by any person other than a Commissioner, but it seems to me if it does not we might add legislation giving the Commissioners the power to appoint examiners or officers similar to masters in chancery to take testimony and to report it to the Commission. I believe only the very important cases should draw the members of this Commission from Washington, for the more important consideration is the deliberation and the conclusion of the whole Commission regarding a particular complaint.

So, accepting as I do the view that five Commissioners can deliberate more effectively regarding these matters than seven, I shall vote for five rather than for seven; I shall vote for seven rather than for nine; and I am sure that so far as taking testimony is concerned, if it is found that the labor of the Commission requires the services of more men than constitutes the present or the future Commission, legislation can be shaped which will give them the assistance that they desire in the power to employ examiners who will take the testimony.

With reference to the districts from which these Commissioners shall be appointed, I, of course, realize that they ought fairly to represent the entire country, and that the Executive, in selecting them, should have in view the entire country, so that each section will be fairly represented on that Commission in proportion to its population, its business, its traffic, or its railway mileage, and I assume that the President will always take these matters into consideration, just as he does in the appointment of the members of the Supreme Court. I do not believe there has ever been any complaint that the Supreme Court is not sufficiently national in character; that it does not sufficiently represent every part of the country; and yet the President is not compelled to appoint members of the Supreme Court from particular districts or from particular sections of the country. What I fear is that if we designate these districts, we then shall give these appointments the character of sectionalism; that if a man is appointed to this Commission from a particular district, embracing six or seven States, he will feel when he goes on that Commisssion that he represents those States and that the people of those States are in a measure his constituency. I am sure that is the feeling in Congress, and properly so. I am sure that every Member of the House of Representatives feels that he represents a particular district and a particular section, and that it is his duty to look out for that district and that section. So also in the Senate we represent our States.

THE COMMISSION SHOULD BE NATIONAL, NOT SECTIONAL, IN CHARACTER, AND FREE FROM POLITICAL PRESSURE.

I should deprecate that sentiment with reference to this Commission. I feel that every member of it should realize the national character of that body and that he represents the entire people and not any particular section of country or of the people. I fear that a Commissioner selected from a particular district would be likely to feel that he represented that particular district and that particular constituency and that it must be the especial object of his regard and solicitude, and I fear that the people of that district might also look upon it in the same way. They might feel that he was their special representative; that he was there for the purpose of looking out for their interests; that he was there to look out for the particular interests of the section or the district from which he was appointed, and that if he, having in view the national character of his position, should render decisions that were adverse to his particular section the people of the section or district which he represented would regard such decisions as opposed to their business interests and would express their dissatisfaction. I fear that when such Commissioner came up for reappointment there would be political action in that particular district; that there would be an effort made to prevent his reappointment, and that thus gradually we might introduce in this Commission the opinion that the Commissioner represented not the nation, but a section, and that a Commissioner best discharged his duty who looked out for the interests of the people whom he represented. So, Mr. President, I shall oppose any amendment which provides for these appointments from districts.

THE COURTS SHOULD NOT INFRINGE THE ADMINISTRATIVE POWERS OF THE COMMISSION.

My own judgment is that we had better leave this section just as it came from the House of Representatives, increasing the salary, if that should be the judgment of the Senate. I believe with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] that this Commission should be made a tribunal of the highest character and dignity, the greatest administrative body of the country, and approaching in dignity and in character the Supreme Court of the United States. It is with that view that I have voted against any proposition which would seem to give the courts any control over the administrative functions of this tribunal. I have been solicitous that the administrative powers under the acts of Congress should be entirely separate from the judicial powers of the courts, and I was content to leave those judicial powers unimpaired, to be exercised by the courts according to their custom and according to known remedies, whether by preliminary or permanent injunction in the protection of property. Feeling that they had the jurisdiction, I have been desirous that they should define their own powers upon this matter, and I have felt satisfied that they would confine them in the future, as they have in the past, simply to the determination of the question as to whether the action of the Commission was such as to prevent the carriers from receiving a fair return upon their property. I think we have kept these powers measurably separate, although I am not altogether satisfied with the provision for court review that has been adopted. I am inclined to think, however, that under it the courts will assume no greater jurisdiction and no greater power than that which they have hitherto exercised and that they will decline to assume administrative functions or to review purely administrative acts which are not destructive of property rights. I believe that if we can only now impress the country with the importance of this great tribunal, its dignity, and its character, the custom will grow of appointing to it men of the highest ability and integrity.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask leave to withdraw the amendment which I offered, and to offer it as now modified. I move to strike out section 8 of the bill, and in lieu thereof to insert:

On the passage of this act an Interstate Commerce Commission shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to take the place of the present Interstate Commerce Commission.

I will explain the amendment, which is, as I have said, a substitute for section 8, being the first four lines of the amendment I have heretofore offered.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Maine if he desires to speak.

Mr. HALE. I hope Senators will examine the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts. I think it very important they should do so in order to get at the right result. If the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts carries——

Mr. LODGE. That is, the amendment I have just now offered?

Mr. HALE. Yes; providing for a Commission of nine. If that amendment carries, then I shall move to insert, after the word "Commission," these words—and I ask Senators to listen to them to see if they do not help to maintain the proposition of the Commission. That amendment reads:

On the passage of this act an Interstate Commerce Commission shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to take the place of the present Interstate Commerce Commission.

If that amendment carries, I shall move to insert, after the word "Commission," the following words:

To be appointed one from each of nine transportation districts, to be established by the President, so as to fairly represent the interstate commerce of the different portions of the United States.

That, Mr. President, will establish the size of the Commission, the apportioning of it to transportation districts to be established by the President so as fairly to represent the interstate commerce of the different portions of the United States. I do not see in a practical way how we can do more than that now. We can not fix the boundaries of these different districts. I would be willing to leave that to the President, only keeping in mind, as he ought, the final result of having every portion of the United States, East and West, North and South, fairly represented in these districts.

Mr. CULLOM. What portion of the amendment does the Senator from Massachusetts wish to offer?

Mr. LODGE. I will state my purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). The proposed amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] will be stated.

Mr. LODGE. I propose to strike out all of section 8 and insert the first four lines of my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendment will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all of section 8 and in lieu thereof to insert:

On the passage of this act an Interstate Commerce Commission shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to take the place of the present Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. HALE. Now, will the Secretary read what I shall offer if the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts carries?

Mr. LODGE. I should like——

Mr. HALE. I do not wish to interfere with the Senator's amendment.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator does not offer that as an amendment to my amendment, but it is to be offered subsequently if my amendment carries.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so understands.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. I have the floor.

Mr. TELLER. I understand the Senator has modified his amendment so as to leave out all except the first four lines.

Mr. LODGE. Yes. My purpose is this, and I might as well state it now and make it clear to the Senate: The question of how many Commissioners we shall have and the question of what salaries they shall receive are to me unessential. It seems to me it will shorten the debate and help us to complete the bill, which we are all most anxious to do, to decide, first, whether we are going to have a new and reorganized commission at all. If we decide that we shall have a new commission, then we can go on and perfect the proposed law, decide as to the number of members of the Commission, decide their tenure, and decide all the other qualifications. If we are not going to have a new commission, if we are going to leave it as it is, we had better determine that at once, and it will cut off a great deal of debate.

I am suggesting this because I have observed that the debate has run largely upon points which I do not regard as essential. The point that seems to me essential is to give the President the opportunity, when this new law shall be passed, to appoint a new commission, one representative of all the country, one consisting of the best men that he can possibly get. I do not want to compel him to keep the five men now there if he chooses to make substitutions. If he chooses to reappoint them, very well; but I do not think it is wise, in the presence of this great measure, to compel the appointment or the selection of any five men in the country.

I think with the new law there should go a new Commission. Let it be composed of seven members, if you please, as the House provided, with salaries of $10,000, or let it be nine, as I have suggested, and as I think is better, with salaries of $12,000. What I want to get at is to give the President the opportunity to appoint a new Commission. If he sees fit he can reappoint all the old members. There is nothing to prevent his doing so under my proposition; but if he should want to make changes, give him the opportunity.

Under this bill we are giving this Commission enormous powers. It is not a question of the amount of business they will have to do; it is the gigantic responsibilities that we are placing upon them; and I think we ought to try not only to get the best and ablest men, but I think they ought to be properly distributed in appointment through the country.

That is the reason, Mr. President, I want to bring the matter to an issue. If the Senate believe that we ought to try to get the strongest possible Commission, distributed fairly throughout the country, then they will vote for the amendment I propose now. If they do not feel so and defeat the amendment, then there is no use in wasting time over the discussion of transportation districts or judicial districts, or whether nine is a better number than seven, or $12,000 is a more suitable salary than $10,000. I think we can save time by going directly to the point as proposed by the amendment I now offer—Shall we make an attempt at all to reorganize and improve the Commission?

Mr. DICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly, I yield to the Senator.

Mr. DICK. I want to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if he has objection to the further division of his amendment, so that we may vote on the two propositions—one that a new Commission may be appointed, and the other as to the number of members of that Commission?

Mr. LODGE. I divide it now, Mr. President. My sole proposition now is contained in the first four lines of the original amendment, as follows:

On the passage of this act an Interstate Commerce Commission shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to take the place of the present Interstate Commerce Commission.

It is one single proposition. It does not prevent the President from reappointing anybody. Every member of the present Commission can be reappointed, but it does prevent him from being compelled to appoint five men.

Mr. HALE. And when the Senator's proposition carries in the Senate, then the whole subject-matter is left to us as to whether the number of Commissioners shall be nine or seven, and whether there shall be transportation districts, according to my amendment, etc. But that is only possible if the Senate adopts the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts, which provides for a new Commission.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will take the liberty of suggesting to the Senator from Maine that as the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts is to strike out and insert, if that should carry it would not be amendable as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LODGE. But the rest could be added as new matter at the end of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. At the end of the bill.

Mr. STONE. I desire to ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether he has any doubt as to the right of Congress to legislate the present Commissioners out of office? He does not propose to abolish the Commission, but simply to authorize the President of the United States to appoint a new board.

Mr. LODGE. I can not conceive that there is the slightest doubt that we could abolish the Commission or authorize the President to appoint a new board or put other officers in their places, or anything else. The board is of our creation.

Mr. STONE. I presume he could do it, of course, but whether we can——

Mr. LODGE. He can not change the law.

Mr. STONE. He can not change the law?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly not.

Mr. STONE. It was suggested around me here that he could do so.

Mr. ALDRICH. He can discharge them for inefficiency.

Mr. STONE. Certainly, for cause.

Mr. LODGE. They are appointed for a definite tenure under the present law, and the President can not change the membership of the Commission except on the expiration of their terms.

Mr. STONE. The point I had in mind to inquire of the Senator was whether the mere authority of the President to appoint a new board of Commissioners would vacate the offices held by the present Commissioners?

Mr. LODGE. I think the language of my amendment is plain. It reads:

On the passage of this act an Interstate Commerce Commission shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to take the place of the present Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. TELLER. Is the Senator through?

Mr. LODGE. I yield the floor.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I desire to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question as to whether if the amendment which he now proposes be adopted, it is his purpose then to seek to further amend the bill in relation to the Commission, the number of Commissioners of which it shall be composed, their compensation, and their distribution?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly. If the amendment be adopted, those questions will then be for the Senate to determine.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Then, the Senator would not be entirely accurate in his statement that the President could, if he so desired, reappoint all the members of the present Commission, because they could not be reappointed upon any basis of distribution which could possibly obtain, I think, in the bill. I can conceive no possible basis of distribution which would include all the present members of the Commission.

Mr. LODGE. I understand the Senator to mean, then, that there are two members of the present Commission from the second judicial circuit, who would clash with each other in appointment if there should be a distribution provided for in the bill.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I think there must be——

Mr. LODGE. There is nobody else——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I knew it must affect somebody by reason of the present location of some of the Commissioners, and if appointed under any equitable distribution, of course some of them would be affected.

Mr. LODGE. It would affect, of course, those appointments, but the amendment may be framed by the Senate so that the President can take them all from one State, if he is so minded.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I should prefer that.

Mr. LODGE. That is a thing for the Senate to decide; but from where he shall take them, how many there shall be, what their salaries shall be, it is not worth while to spend time in discussing unless we are determined to make a change.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. But I thought it worth while, Mr. President, to call the Senator's attention to the fact that he was inaccurate in his statement, if he proposed to follow this amendment up with another providing for distribution, etc.

Mr. LODGE. I do not think I am inaccurate in my statement, Mr. President. The Senate may vote down the proposition of distributing these appointments. That is a different matter. Whether we reorganize the board or not, the Senate may decide that, because there happen to be now two Commissioners from one judicial circuit; therefore all this legislation should fall, and there should be nothing more done. But it is perfectly true that if we determine to make a new commission, that does not limit the President in any way. We may limit him afterwards by putting in a clause about distribution; but I do not think it is worth while to pass the day discussing other features of the measure when we can decide once for all whether we will deal with it. That is what I am trying to bring to a point before the Senate.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I should like to have had the benefit of the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts, but owing to the confusion in this section of the Chamber and the fact that the Senator turned his face away from us, I have been utterly at a loss to know what in the last few moments he has said.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, as I understand the law, while the present Commissioners are appointed for a term, yet the President, in his judgment, whenever he thinks they are inefficient or are not properly discharging their duties, can remove them; in other words, he can make a vacancy. I much prefer that he should do that, and not we. It does not seem to me to be a wise thing for the legislative body to undertake to remove people from office.

Away back, a good many years ago, immediately after the civil war, we had some experience in that line; and in times of excitement and disagreement between the executive and the legislative branches of the Government there is very great danger of an abuse of this power. I am not in favor of asserting it, even if we have the right; but I doubt whether we have the right to do that. We can abolish this board, as we can abolish all other offices, except those created by the Constitution. This, however, is not a proposition to abolish the board, but merely to reorganize it with a new membership. That is what it practically amounts to. I do not think we ought to do that. I do not know many of the members of the Commission—in fact, I only know one, and that is the former Senator from Missouri, Mr. Cockrell. I think I have never seen any of the others; but I am under the impression that the business of the board has been very properly conducted. I do not feel inclined to join in any effort to discredit them, for whatever may be the motive that induces this proposition, it will discredit them. If they are properly there, properly serving, and the President so thinks, they ought to remain there, and we ought to increase the number if we think the Commission is too small.

On the question whether there shall be nine or seven or five Commissioners, I am myself inclined to accept the House provision for seven members as sufficient. However, I do not consider it very important whether the number be seven or nine. I shall be quite content with whatever the Senate does in that matter. I am inclined to think that five is rather a small board to do the work.

When you come to the question of the distribution of the Commissioners, I think there is not the danger suggested by the Senator from Nevada, that they would come to think in a short time that they were representing their immediate sections of the country; for, as suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin, if they should get that idea in their minds, it would be evidence that proper selections had not been made. Of course Representatives in Congress are elected to represent particular sections of the country and particular populations, and we are sent here to represent the States in which we live.

Mr. President, I do not think there is any necessity of distribution upon the principle of patronage. There is some advantage in having a distribution of these officers as there is as to all other officers. A man who lives in the eighth circuit, in which I live—the largest circuit of all—if appointed from that circuit would have more knowledge of the conditions there than a man appointed from the first or the second or the third or the fourth or the fifth circuit. And yet I think it is going to be exceedingly difficult to divide this country up into districts in such a way that there will not be a continual complaint about it. I think good administration on the part of the Executive, who has these officers to appoint, if there are nine of them, will distribute them with reference to the country, not, I repeat, because the country desires the patronage, but because a man coming from a certain section will have better knowledge of that particular section and the wants of the people in connection with their transportation than if he comes from another section of the country. I think myself that is an exceedingly difficult question to deal with on this bill, and I do not believe it will be dealt with very satisfactorily.

I do not like the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts to legislate the present Commission out of office. I think we ought to determine the question whether the Commission shall consist of nine or seven or five members. The House bill provides for seven. If we say "nine," I have no doubt the House will agree to it; at least I should presume so. That is the first question, in my mind, to be settled. Then, shall extra members be added, or shall we leave the President to create an entirely new Commission, if he sees fit to do so, which he can do if we turn the present Commissioners out? He may put some of them back. He may think it is wise to do it, or he may think it is not; but we give him no power that he does not now possess if he sees fit to exercise it. I can not give my approval to the amendment.

Mr. NELSON. I move to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator will withhold his motion for a moment, as I desire to say something on the subject.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota withhold the motion?

Mr. NELSON. Yes; I do not want to cut off the Senator.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the original amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] was intended to be a complete substitute for section 8. In other words, it was complete in itself, and was intended to supplant in its entirety section 8. The amendment which he now offers, while he offers it as a substitute for section 8, is accompanied with a declaration that it is but the beginning, and that he proposes thereafter, with the aid of other Senators who agree with him, to build up upon that and reconstruct a section which shall be complete in itself to take the position of the existing eighth section.

Mr. President, if the present eighth section is substantially one that Senators favor, there is no reason to strike it out for the purpose of experimenting to see whether, in the process of evolution which the Senator contemplates, a superior section can be created. I think the eighth section, with one exception, is the one I would prefer. The one exception in which I do not agree with the eighth section is in the matter of salary. About that I shall probably have a word to say a little later.

But to come immediately to the direct proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts, it is embodied in the simple suggestion that we strike out the eighth section and provide for the creation of a new commission. That is the direct purpose of the present amendment—to abolish the present Commission and make provision for a new commission, the declaration being made at the same time that when that is done all the other features which are necessary for the completion of that section it is proposed thereafter to add by separate amendments.

Mr. President, why should we abolish the present Commission? If it is an incompetent one, if it is made up of incompetent men, then it should be abolished. If Senators are prepared to say upon the floor of the Senate that the members of that Commission are not men of the qualifications, either of mind or of character, properly to fit them for the discharge of the duties of the office, then, of course, an issue is made upon which we will pass when we come to vote upon the question whether or not the Commission shall be abolished. But no suggestion of that kind is made. No Senator here, so far as I have heard, has intimated that any one of these Commissioners is an improper man for the position. If not, why should he be removed? Can Senators shut their eyes to the fact that to remove these Commissioners must necessarily be a reflection upon them? Is it any reply to say that the President will reappoint them? Senators who have said that have said they thought a majority of them would be reappointed. If that is the case, why not let them remain as they are?

But the Senator from Massachusetts insists upon one proposition. I have endeavored to preserve in my mind his words. He says: "Why compel the President to keep these men?" Mr. President, the relation of the President of the United States to this Commission is a very different one from what I regard it if these officers remaining in position can be said to put upon the President of the United States the necessity of keeping them. Who put them in his keeping, except so far as it is his duty to see to the execution of the law? They are not his special officers. They are not even officers of the executive department. By what right does the Senator speak of it as a situation in which the President is compelled to keep certain men? They are officers of the United States under the present law, and those who will be in position under the law as we shall amend it will still be officers of the United States, not the officers of the President, and not even the officers of the department of which he is the chief. Unless some special reason can be shown why these are unworthy men, there is every reason why we should not remove them from office. It will necessarily be a reflection upon them. They have done their duty; they have been diligent and capable in office, and why should this stigma be put upon them; and if some are to be reappointed, still the greater stigma upon those who are not reappointed?

Mr. President, as to the eighth section, I am very much inclined to the opinion that five would be a proper number for the constitution of the Commission. But I am willing to concede seven, as provided in the bill of the House. I think beyond that it would be an unwieldy body. But I do not agree to the proposition that they should be paid either the amount named in the amendment which the Senator from Massachusetts has withdrawn or the amount proposed in this bill. It may not be that that is an excessive amount, but it is an amount out of proportion to the scale of salaries which we have, and I do not think that in the creation of an office or in the continuation of an office we should single out this particular department or that particular department for the purpose of raising salaries out of proportion to the general scale.

It seems to me to be a preposterous proposition that an officer created for the discharge of the duties specified in this bill should by the solemn enactment of Congress be adjudged to be entitled to a larger salary than the Vice-President of the United States; to be entitled to a larger salary than the head of any Department of the United States, from the Secretary of State down to the lowest in rank of heads of Departments, and twice as much as a Senator or a Representative in Congress.

I will not repeat what was so admirably said by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. I agree with him in every word he said. I never intend, so long as I am honored by a seat in this body, to vote hereafter for the increase of the salary of an officer which shall, in my opinion, be above the level of the general scale of the salaries which we have. Whenever the lawmaking power is ready to take up the question of salaries and recast them and put them all in proper relation and in proper proportion, I shall be ready to take hold of the subject. But I am utterly unwilling to fix a salary for a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission which shall be superior in amount to the salary paid the Vice-President of the United States, or to the head of any single Department.

I recognize the fact, of course, that there is much in the contention that these officers should be put in a position of dignity; and I want to call the attention of the Senate to one particular in which we can increase the dignity of these officers, and in which I think their dignity should be increased. Under the law as it now exists any Commissioner can be removed from office by the President of the United States for inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office, arbitrarily, without a trial. That is the law now, and it is a provision which we propose to leave in the bill, because there is nothing in the pending bill to repeal that part of the law. I think it should be repealed.

No man can hold an office of dignity such as the Senator from Maine properly insists this shall be an office of dignity, who can be dismissed by the President of the United States from office as he would dismiss his coachman.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator from Georgia permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BACON. I will.

Mr. BERRY. Has not the Supreme Court decided that the tenure-of-office act was unconstitutional, and can not the President remove any officer, except a judge who holds his office for life?

Mr. BACON. I think not; not by any means.

Mr. BERRY. Does the Senator think there is any Government officer, except United States judges, whom he can not remove?

Mr. BACON. He certainly can not remove anyone in the legislative department.

Mr. BERRY. Nobody ever supposed he could.

Mr. BACON. I understand that; nor in the judicial department.

Mr. BERRY. But any executive officer appointed by him. Was it not decided when the tenure-of-office act was declared unconstitutional, and most of it, including that part of it, repealed?

Mr. BACON. Of course, with respect to an officer in the executive department, that is true, but this is not an Executive Department.

Mr. BERRY. But they are appointed by the President.

Mr. BACON. Yes; they are appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. It would be exactly as we ourselves may designate in this bill. In the absence of prohibition by Congress the President can remove an officer appointed by him under the law. But it is perfectly competent for Congress to prohibit such removal in any given case, and when so prohibited the President would have no power to remove the officer. If the Senator's contention were correct, it would be unnecessary that there should be this designation in the proposed law.

Mr. BERRY. I leave it to the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], who is a constitutional lawyer. Personally I do not think there is any question about it.

Mr. BACON. The Senator can argue that question. I do not object to his presenting his view upon it. I think it is perfectly competent for us to strike out this provision of the law. An officer of the United States is subject to removal by impeachment, under the Constitution of the United States, and to strike out the provision in the law does not in any manner affect that remedy provided for by the Constitution.

Mr. President, I do not desire to detain the Senate longer upon this subject. I wanted distinctly to state the proposition that I favor the eighth section of the bill, and for that reason I do not favor the substitute offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, which is simply a proposition now to provide for the removal of the present Commission, with a promise that upon that being done there shall thereafter be built up piece by piece a section which, if approved by the Senate, shall take the place of section 8.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I simply now offer the amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, and I do not propose to take any time. Let it be read, and then, if the Senator from Minnesota wishes to move to lay it on the table, he can do so.

Mr. BERRY. I want to say a few words before the motion to table is made.

Mr. HALE. Let the amendment be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert:

To be appointed one from each of nine transportation districts, to be established by the President so as fairly to represent the interstate commerce of the different portions of the United States.

Mr. HALE. Now let the Secretary read the whole proposition, with my amendment, so that the Senate may see what it means.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all of section 8 and insert the following:

On the passage of this act an Interstate Commerce Commission shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to take the place of the present Interstate Commerce Commission, to be appointed one from each of nine transportation districts, to be established by the President so as fairly to represent the interstate commerce of the different portions of the United States.

Mr. HALE. It is suggested, although I think this is covered by the amendment——

Mr. GALLINGER. It is not——

Mr. HALE. That we put in the words "said Commission to consist of nine members."

Mr. LODGE. Before the words "to be appointed."

Mr. HALE. I do not think that is needed, but still it makes it certain.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The modification will be stated.

The Secretary read as follows:

Said Commission to consist of nine members, to be appointed one from each of nine transportation districts.

Mr. HALE. I shall not take any more of the time of the Senate.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, I desire to say that I agree with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] that we ought not to pass a law directing the President to remove these Commissioners. It would be a reflection upon them, one which I think is not justified or warranted by anything in the history of the Commission. They are men of high character, and have discharged their duties faithfully and well. I am not willing to vote for the proposition which simply intends to give the President the power to appoint anew without his assuming any responsibility.

I agree with the Senator from Georgia also in regard to the question of salaries. I do not believe any such salary as ten or twelve thousand dollars a year should be given. I do not think it is necessary in order to get good men and men of high character. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] said yesterday that if we made these salaries large it would insure the best talent and insure absolute integrity and honesty, or words to that effect, or would have that tendency. I think the recent developments in the insurance cases in New York show that the worst men were those who received the very largest salaries—those of a hundred thousand dollars—and that those large salaries did not secure honesty and efficiency. I therefore am not in favor of this large increase.

Now, in regard to the President's power to remove, while I do not pretend that I am equal to the Senator from Georgia as a constitutional lawyer, my understanding is that as to any executive office, where the appointee is appointed by the President under a law which authorizes him to make the appointment and the Senate to confirm him, the President can remove the occupant without giving any reason whatever, and that he exercises the power daily and weekly.

Mr. BACON. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BERRY. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. The Senator will recognize the fact that we can pass a law by which we establish a commission to which there are delegated powers which would be solely legislative powers—that is, within the limits, of course, as to prescribing the way in which it should be done. I am not asking the Senator a question, because I do not propose to enter into a colloquy on the subject. But I will simply state to him that, while I may be in error, according to my opinion undoubtedly that would be a class of officers whom the President of the United States would not have the right to remove, and that the decision to which he refers has no application. But however that may be, Congress would have the power to prohibit the removal of such an officer. The decisions of the Supreme Court will be found to be to that effect.

Mr. BERRY. I am discussing the class of officers referred to here, whose offices are created by act of Congress, and who are appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. My statement a while ago was based upon my recollection of what was known as the "tenure-of-office act," passed a great many years ago. It gave rise to a great deal of controversy. It afterwards went to the courts, and if not wholly, at least a large part of it was declared to be unconstitutional. Subsequently, since I have been a member of the Senate, the remainder of the act was repealed, and since that it has always been held, as I understand, that the President when he appoints an officer, even by and with the advice and consent of the Senate—those offices which are already provided for by law and those which we provide for from time to time—can remove him at his will. Of course he can not remove a United States judge, who holds during life or good behavior.

Mr. BACON. What the Senator says is true of officers who are officers of the executive department unless Congress prohibits such removal.

Mr. BERRY. I will ask the Senator if it is not true as to an office created by act of Congress, which we authorize the President to fill by appointment by and with the advice and consent of the Senate—one of the Interstate Commerce Commissioners holding office to-day, if you please? I repeat that such is the practice, and it has been so since I have been in any way connected with the Government.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] has offered the amendment he proposes to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. It is proper that they should both be considered together. The effect of those amendments is to localize the Commission instead of leaving it general, as it is now. I think no one can charge that the present Commissioners have acted for local interests. They have been over the whole country and have acted entirely free from any local interest or favoritism.

The effect of this, of course, will be, if such districts are formed, to legislate one of the Commissioners out of office. So far as it affects an individual, it is of very little consequence, if it is wise legislation; but it seems to me it is not. This Commission, under the House provision, is to be increased. The men now on the Commission are thoroughly familiar with the business. Their influence and work will be very valuable to the new men coming on the Commission. The term of service of the present Commissioners is not long. I know, with reference to one of them, that his term will expire very soon. If a change is desired, it can readily be brought about by the President. In the long run, the distribution, I believe, will be fair. I think now perhaps it is not; but it has so come about.

Now, one other point. This measure has been before the Senate for a long time. Every possible proposition has been made. It seems near final action. It seems to me unwise to introduce radical changes. They have got to be agreed upon by another body. I for one am in favor of adhering to the House provision as nearly as possible, for the sake of bringing about in the shortest time an efficient measure of rate legislation.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I feel that an apology is due the Senate for introducing into this interesting and instructive discussion an extraneous matter, but it appears that no opportune moment will come. I have already waited too long.

On Saturday last the Senate was startled and doubtless mortified to hear the statement of an honored ex-member of this body, on the authority of a telephonic message, denounced as being a deliberate and unqualified falsehood, and as I had the misfortune, I may term it, of bringing about the situation which caused this denunciation to be made, I feel under some obligations—very sacred obligations—to the man whose good name was thus attacked, and who is my trusted friend, and also an obligation to myself to sustain—although I do not know that is necessary—my own good faith in reading the statement I did, to give to the Senate, in order that it may go into the RECORD, the authoritative statement signed and sent to me by Mr. Chandler. I shall not give it all. I shall only give that part of it which relates to the particular subject I have just mentioned.

Memorandum made by William E. Chandler about the conferences of Attorney-General Moody and Mr. Chandler, representing President Roosevelt, with Senators TILLMAN and BAILEY concerning the railroad rate bill in 1906.

On Saturday afternoon, March 31, 1906, a friend of mine came into my office and told me of the White House conference of that day, in which an understanding as to a limited court review had been reached with Senator LONG and others, and he told me that the President wished to get into communication with the Democrats and would shortly ask me to come and see him. While he was talking a messenger boy arrived with a letter to me from Mr. Loeb as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, March 31, 1906.

MY DEAR SENATOR CHANDLER: The President requests me to say that he would be glad to have you come to the White House to see him at 8.30 o'clock to-night. Will you please let the bearer know whether you can come?

Very truly, yours,
WM. LOEB, Jr.,
Secretary to the President.

Hon. W. E. CHANDLER,
1421 I Street.

I told the messenger I would be there.

At the time and place appointed the President said to me that he wished through me to get into communication with Mr. TILLMAN, Mr. BAILEY, and other Democratic Senators. He stated his purpose slowly and carefully, and, in exact substance, his statement was this: That he had reached the conclusion that the best plan for railroad rate legislation was to expressly grant a court review, but to distinctly limit it to two points—first, an inquiry whether the Interstate Commerce Commission had exceeded its authority, and, second, an inquiry whether the constitutional rights of the carrier had been violated. He said that he had been much troubled by the advocacy of an unlimited court review by some of the lawyers of the Senate, naming Senators KNOX, SPOONER, and FORAKER, as trying to injure or defeat the bill by ingenious constitutional arguments, but that he had come to a complete disagreement with them. He made this point emphatic by repetition; said that he would go thus far and no further and that his decision would be unalterable. He said that he wished to ascertain whether there could be united action in the Senate among the friends of the bill, so that it could be surely passed without injurious amendments; and he named various Republican Senators who he thought were true friends of the bill, but said that it would take nearly all the Democrats to carry the limitation and defeat all obnoxious provisions.

After the President had made his statement I replied that I had reason to believe that most of the Democrats in the Senate would sustain his limitation of the courts' powers, but that I was sure that Mr. BAILEY and Mr. TILLMAN would insist upon coupling with the limitation some restriction upon the power of the courts to issue injunctions against the orders of the Commission. Before I had finished my statement on this point the President interrupted me, saying that I need not explain further, because he was warmly in favor of some such restriction.

I do not deem it necessary to read the rest of this letter at the present time. While I am dealing with this subject, I noted this morning, and Senators have read in the papers, a letter addressed to the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] by the President, in which this subject is presented from his point of view. I had expected that possibly something would be said about the question of veracity between the President and Mr. Chandler. But if nothing is said I have nothing more to do with it other than to put the record before the country, or rather to put in enduring form Mr. Chandler's own statement to me.

I had also anticipated that possibly, as the future historian will have some trouble in digging out of newspapers the facts in the case, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], or some other friend of the President, would put into the RECORD the letter from the White House. But that has not been done, and I feel myself called upon to make some little comment on that letter.

There are only two points in the President's letter which I deem worthy of notice. His attempted explanation is ingenious, but not ingenuous. He a second time calls in question the integrity of purpose and utterance of Mr. Chandler by declaring "he was asked to see ex-Senator Chandler, as representing Mr. TILLMAN, who was in charge of the bill. He stated to me the views of Mr. TILLMAN with seeming authority." Mr. Chandler has declared most positively in a written statement that the President sent for him for the purpose of getting into communication with Senator BAILEY and myself, and he has produced the letter of Mr. Loeb to prove it. I have seen the original myself. I now and here, Mr. President, declare most emphatically that to no human being have I ever given authority or even expressed a wish to have any conference with Theodore Roosevelt in regard to the bill now under consideration. On the contrary, I have expressed the opinion in more than one published interview that he had nothing to do with it, and that it was the business of the Senate, and while I did at his request enter into negotiations with the Attorney-General it is well known to every Senator on this floor what my attitude and feelings have been, and it is most remarkable, while the President sent for Democrat after Democrat to confer with him about this measure, that he should undertake, under the circumstances, to assert that I sent an agent to him to begin negotiations. The statement is absurd on its face.

The other point to which I shall refer is the cavalier way in which Mr. Moody discusses the idea of the President not being "bound." While contradicting in no instance, however slight, my statement of what occurred, the Attorney-General seems to think that the code of honor among gentlemen is not binding upon the Executive and his Cabinet. The President asked him to see Mr. BAILEY and myself. We met by appointment made by ex-Senator Chandler and talked over the vital question. He wrote and sent to Mr. BAILEY his understanding of our views, and when we met subsequently we reached absolute agreement, both as to the form and the substance of a proposed amendment, to which he said the President would assent and help get votes for. Of course the President was not bound not to change, but he was bound under such circumstances to give notice, and this was not done. Even the Attorney-General himself was not notified.

The charge I made and still make is that the President is guilty of bad faith, and that the rate bill, which will be when enacted into law a much better and stronger measure than we had hoped to get, has been emasculated of one of its most valuable and essential features by the President's action.

I am ready, Mr. President, to leave the whole question to the thoughtful and honorable men of the country.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, yesterday, in the evening, I received a letter from the President, addressed to me, and inclosed with it a letter to the President from the Attorney-General. I have been awaiting with some patience an opportunity to present this letter to the Senate and ask that it may be placed upon the records of the Senate as a part of the situation. I think it is due to the President that the record, so far as his statements are concerned, shall be made as permanent as the record just now made by the Senator from South Carolina. This letter, I think, is chiefly addressed to the subject-matter mentioned by the Senator from South Carolina. I ask that it may be read at the clerks' desk, and also the letter of the Attorney-General accompanying it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, May 14, 1906.

MY DEAR SENATOR: As Senator TILLMAN brought in your name in connection with mine in the statement he made concerning our relations to the rate bill last Saturday, it is, perhaps, due to you that I should write you on the matter. After the rate bill was reported from the committee, and after, by vote of the committee, Mr. TILLMAN had been put in charge of it, many Senators and many outsiders came to see me with reference to it. Among others I was asked to see ex-Senator Chandler, as representing Mr. TILLMAN, who was in charge of the bill. I stated in response that I was, of course, entirely willing to see Mr. TILLMAN personally, or to see Mr. Chandler or anyone else who could speak for him, and I accordingly directed my secretary to make an appointment for Mr. Chandler to see me. My understanding was that he was the representative of Mr. TILLMAN. In this first interview he stated to me the views of Mr. TILLMAN, with seeming authority. He called on me several times. During the same period I saw other gentlemen who professed to give the views of other Senators. In addition, I saw numerous Senators, both Republicans and Democrats, some of them once or twice, some of them many times. I also saw numerous outsiders, railroad men, shippers, newspaper men, and students of traffic regulation, including, especially, the Attorney-General and the members of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and on two occasions I saw groups of newspaper men in a mass. To all of these, Senators, representatives of Senators, and outsiders alike, I made the same statements; those that I made to Mr. Chandler being the same in substance that I made to you and to those of your colleagues of both political parties with whom I had any extended conferences on the subject. The letter of the Attorney-General, which I inclose, shows fully the facts as to the conferences which, at my instance, he held with Senators TILLMAN and BAILEY. Those conferences were precisely such as, at my instance, he held with many other Senators, to determine the phraseology and discuss the effect of amendments proposed by them.

To all whom I saw I stated that the Hepburn bill was in its essence entirely satisfactory to me. The Hepburn bill as it passed the House simply recognized the right of review by the courts—that is, the jurisdiction of the courts—but did not attempt to define it, thus leaving the courts to prescribe the limits of their own jurisdiction. This was in accordance with the ideas of the Attorney-General, his belief being that thereby we avoided all danger of the bill being declared unconstitutional because of the attempt to confer too much or too little jurisdiction on the courts.

I also repeatedly stated that while it was entirely satisfactory to me simply to leave the Hepburn bill in substance as it was—that is, with the recognition of the jurisdiction of the courts, but without any attempt to define that jurisdiction—yet that I was entirely willing that there should be a definition, provided that this definition did not seek to grant a broad review, but explicitly narrowed it to the two subjects which, as a matter of fact, I believed that the courts would alone consider in case there was no attempt to define the limits of their review; that is, would limit it to the question as to whether the Commission had acted ultra vires and as to whether any man's constitutional rights had been impaired. I stated that if the question of defining or limiting the review was brought up at all I personally felt that this was the way in which it should be limited or defined.

At different times at least a score of tentative amendments were either prepared by the Attorney-General at the request of Senators or submitted to me by Senators. As to many of those amendments—including, among others, the substance of the so-called Long, Overman, Bacon, and Spooner amendments—I stated that I should be entirely satisfied to have them in the bill; as to others, I suggested modifications which would make them satisfactory; as to none did I ever say, either to Mr. Chandler or to anyone else, that I should insist upon having them in the bill as a condition of my approving it. On the contrary, I was always most careful to state that I was not trying to dictate any particular programme of action. In no case, either in the case of Mr. Chandler or in the case of anyone else, was there the slightest opportunity for any honest misconception of my attitude or any belief that I had pledged myself specifically to one and only one amendment or set of amendments, or that I would not be satisfied with any amendment which preserved the essential feature of the Hepburn bill as it came from the House. You will doubtless recall that in the course of the several visits that you personally made me we discussed a number of these proposed amendments, trying to find out for which one there could be obtained a sufficient body of assent to secure its passage and the passage of the rate bill.

To almost every amendment proposed by anyone I found that there were other excellent men who objected, or who at least wished to change it, and I finally became convinced that it was impossible for Senators with advantage to use me as the intermediary in coming to an agreement with their colleagues, especially when they only communicated with me through another intermediary, and I earnestly suggested to all to whom I spoke that they should communicate with you, whose purposes and mine were identical. About this time I was informed by various Democratic Senators that they could not come to an agreement upon any amendment, and that the best chance for success lay in passing the Hepburn bill substantially unchanged. I was informed, and believed, that this was Senator BAILEY'S view, and a number of the Republican Senators who favored the bill expressed the same opinion. Shortly after this you, in company with Senator CULLOM, called upon me with the amendment which is now commonly known as the "Allison amendment." I told you that while I should prefer the Long and Overman amendments, yet that your amendment was entirely satisfactory. Your amendment does not in the slightest degree weaken or injure the Hepburn bill. It merely expresses what the friends of the bill have always asserted was implied by the terms of the bill. I may add that my own opinion that your amendment in no way changed, whether by diminishing or enlarging, the scope of the court review as provided in the original Hepburn bill, is also the opinion of the Attorney-General, of Mr. Root, and of Mr. Taft. Their judgment is that the amendment merely avoids the criticism that the Hepburn bill would be constitutionally invalid in not expressly providing the court review which its supporters have always contended was plainly implied in the original language.

The original Hepburn bill stated that the venue for certain actions was in certain courts; the amendment states that these courts shall have jurisdiction to consider such actions. To my mind it seems difficult to assert that this works any change whatever in the principle of the bill.

Yours, sincerely,

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

Hon. WILLIAM B. ALLISON,
United States Senate.

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., May 14, 1906.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I send, at your request, an account of the conferences which I had by your direction with Senators TILLMAN and BAILEY upon the subject of the court-review feature of the pending rate legislation.

On April 14 you told me that Messrs. TILLMAN and BAILEY had communicated with you, through a third person, informing you that they were willing to support an amendment to the Hepburn bill which, while expressly conferring jurisdiction upon the courts to review the action of the Commission, should limit the review to the two questions of the authority of the Commission and the constitutionality of its action, and include a provision forbidding the issuance of interlocutory injunctions. You told me that they were not willing to confer directly with you, but would meet me. You asked me if I thought that Congress had the power to prohibit the issuance of interlocutory injunctions by courts inferior to the Supreme Court, and I told you that, having read part only of the debate upon that question, the subject being new to me, I had not formed a final opinion. You then asked me whether, if such a provision were declared unconstitutional, it would affect other provisions of the law. I told you that in my opinion it would not, as that provision would be easily separable from the remainder of the law. Recalling the advice which I had the honor to offer to you, that you should not at any stage become finally committed beyond recall to any form of language in any part of the bill and affirming your belief in the wisdom of that course, you then said that a provision limiting the court review to the authority of the Commission and the constitutionality of its acts, and a provision limiting the issuance of interlocutory injunctions as far as was constitutionally possible, would be acceptable to you, provided it was decided not to try to pass the Hepburn bill substantially unchanged, and you asked me to meet the gentlemen named in conference.

The conference was arranged by Mr. Chandler and occurred on April 15. It was full and free. It would be impossible to state all that was said in a conference of two hours, but I think no false color is given to the conference by the following statement:

I informed the gentlemen of my belief that you desired, if the scope of the court review were to be expressed in the law at all, that it should be limited to the two subjects hereinbefore named; that in such case the so-called Long amendment was acceptable to you; that you would be glad to see a rigid limitation on the issuance of interlocutory injunctions if such limitation were possible; and I stated further that I would not assume to agree to any form of language whatever for you, but would submit any proposed amendment to you for your consideration. I also stated my doubt whether, in any event, it would be possible to enact a provision entirely forbidding interlocutory injunctions. I found myself in entire accord with Senator BAILEY as to the rules of constitutional law applicable to the situation, with the exception of those relating to the power of Congress to forbid all interlocutory injunctions, upon which I did not offer any final opinion, only saying that Mr. BAILEY'S argument needed answer.

An attempt was then made to adopt phraseology which would effect the intention of the two Senators. I made some notes upon this branch of the subject, and at the close of the interview said to Senator BAILEY that I would put my understanding of their views upon the question of phraseology in writing, send it to him, and, if it met with his approval, submit it to you. This I did, and on the next day sent the annexed memorandum to Mr. BAILEY, inclosed in a letter which reads as follows:

April 16, 1906.

MY DEAR SENATOR: This rough draft is as I understood your suggestions of yesterday. I think it quite likely that this draft might be bettered, but I simply send it to see if I understood you.

Very truly, yours,

W. H. MOODY.

Hon. JOSEPH W. BAILEY, United States Senate.

The draft referred to is the one printed in last Saturday's RECORD.

The conference among the Democratic members of the Senate then occurred, the press reports of which indicated that there was not an entire agreement among them. Mr. TILLMAN, however, called to assure me that the prospects of an agreement among a large number of the Democratic Senators was good. I heard nothing further from Senator BAILEY until a later date.

I informed you of what occurred at the interview between the two Senators and me, and you told me that you had been informed from various Democratic sources that an agreement among the Democrats upon any amendment would be impossible.

The two Senators called upon me again on the 23d or 24th of April. There was some further talk about the form of the amendment. The suggestion was made that it might be possible, after voting upon the provision forbidding all interlocutory injunctions, to agree upon an amendment which should include the Long amendment and what has been known as the Overman amendment. I then said that, in my opinion, any amendment drawn by anyone representing the executive branch of the Government, even though it were inspired from heaven, would not be accepted without change by the Senate; that that attitude was natural and proper, and that if the exact language of an amendment which could be adopted should be agreed upon it ought to be drawn by the Senators themselves. I suggested Senator ALLISON as a proper person for further conference, and the matter, so far as I was concerned, ended there.

I remember hearing nothing more of it until I was just about taking the train for North Carolina on May 4, when I was informed by Mr. TILLMAN and Mr. Chandler that you had approved another amendment, known as the "Allison amendment."

There was nothing in the conversations between the Senators and me which in any way bound you to any particular amendment or in the slightest degree impaired your liberty at any time to acquiesce in any amendment which you should deem expedient and in the public interest.

Very respectfully,

WILLIAM H. MOODY,
Attorney-General.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I move to lay the pending amendments on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota moves to lay the pending amendments upon the table.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President, I should like to inquire whether the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts was accepted?

Mr. NELSON. My motion includes both.

Mr. LODGE. The motion includes both.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Minnesota to lay the pending amendments on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ELKINS. I move to add, at the end of section 8, the following words:

And the salary of the secretary of the Commission shall be $6,000 per annum.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I move to lay that amendment on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I propose two amendments to section 8. First, to strike out the word "ten," in line 9, and insert "eight;" so that the salaries will be $8,000 annually.

Mr. KEAN (to Mr. GALLINGER). Make it $7,500, the same as existing law.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will make it $7,500, retaining the amount at which it now stands.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 34 of the last reprint of the bill, in line 9, before the word "dollars," it is proposed to strike out "ten thousand" and insert "seven thousand five hundred."

Mr. ELKINS. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. CLAY. I desire to ask the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] if his amendment would leave the Commission consisting of seven, with a salary of $7,500 each, or a Commission of five?
